PUBLISHER'S PREFACE.

THE author of these Memoirs-a famous book in the days of South Carolina Nullification-endeavored to set forth the praise of the "universal" Yankee nation, a theme so lofty that it "had until then remained unattempted in prose or rhyme (except by themselves)."

Along with the real personages, such as his Satanic Majesty, Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, Tristram Burgess, John C. Calhoun, etc., he has introduced a couple of constant lovers. The politician will do well not to omit the poetical and pathetic passages, before he begins with the hero's adventures in Pandemonium. It is not too much to say that this satirical volume, and the witty "counterblast" it evoked-"A YANKER AMONG THE NULLIPIEDS"-will give the reader a better idea of the excited period of our history to which they refer, than can be obtained in more elaborate works. To make them applicable to the present time, he has but to read "Secession" for "Nullification," and bear in mind that the South Carolinians had then about the same antipathy to home products protected by the tariff, that the people of the South now manifest to articles manufactured in the Northern States. The "irrepressible confict" of that day related to the tariff, but was quite as violent as at present. The careful reader will easily distinguish the famous characters introduced whose names are not given.

The writer of the Historical Sketch of Nullification is included for his facts mainly to Parton's excellent "Life of General Jackson," and Benton's "Thirty Years in the Senste."

INTRODUCTORY CHAPTER.

Artin a long and workerful errors. I find that my life is drawing to its close. Justice to myself and to mackind requires that I should not quit the world without leaving behind me some account of my remarkable adventures. I, therefore, write this memoir; but will endeave to abridge it as much as possible.

I was born in one of the Southern States, and passed my early years in a remote district, where the face of the country was wild, and the manner of the inhabitants primitive. I grew up, therefore, with scarrely any other knowledge of mankind than such as I gathered from the pages of history, ramance, and poetry. Nature gave me much imagination, little judgment, an ardent temper, and a crofulous heart. These are qualities which Solitude, the nurse of enthusiasm, tends to beighten, so that my character became, to the last degree, comeatic and visionary. My delight was to gaze upon the leveliness of the intaimate world around me; to sit by the side of a waterfall, listening to its ceaseless music; or to wander beneath the shade of some primeval forest, and indalge in the wildest dreams that imagination could inspire-Of social institutions and of human nature I knew nothing, and fancy pictured them to me in her gayest and most unreal hues. To my young belief, every human creature was my friend, every pretty woman an angel, and all earth one paradise.

My parents died when I had reached the age of twenty. In the dawn of manhood, possessed of a classical education and a handsome person, inderiting from my ancestors an abundaut estate and an homorable name, my destiny certainly promised to be fortunate. With a gay beart, therefore, and a sanguine spirit, I entered upon the theater of the world.

The first thing I did was to fall most despensally in love with Miss Cynthin Angelina Simpson. She was a the miching creature, just securitiest years old. She had soft blue eyes, and a motive fine-level, and ruby lips, and a mellodiust work, and a four-that was absolutely driver. I counted her, and in the course of time she returned my affection in the most distorting names. It would have done may one's heart good to hear the protestations of ever-lasting fidelity with which we continually extertated each order. I went to see her about every third hour, besides which exceed times a day we exchanged a letter, in the less degree in these modern days. It was decided that we should be married in the fall.

Having arranged this matter to my satisfaction, I next proceeded to devise schemes for increasing my estate. 4 am rich already," thought I, "but, for my Cyathia's dear sake, I will make myself still richer." The question was, how it should be done. I went to the chief merchant of the place, who for several years had been carrying on a flourishing trade in the various wares and fabries which New England manufactures so much cheaper than Britain and France; not to mention Peruvian bark, Irish linen, jadigo, cigars, mitmegs, etc., all of them the pure growth of the happy soil of Connecticut. At that time my opinion of the New England character had been derived, not from personal knowledge, but from their own veracious histories. Having read about Putnam, and Warren, and Timothy Dwight, and the Pilgrim Fathers, I suspected not but that their descendants were equally meritorious. Mr. fucrease Hooker, too, possessed so saint-like a countenance. that it would have been almost improus to suppose anything unboly lurked beneath it. I told him that I had some unemplayed money which it would suit me to invest in any profitable manner. He took me into his most secret apartment. "My dear sir," said he, " you are come at a fortunate moment. For some time I have had a plan by which an immense fortune can soon be made, but have hitherto been mable to earry it into execution for want of a little additional capital. There invented a fiving pan, upon a new and wonderful principle. The mechanism is such that the slices of baron, when exactly half done. turn themselves over on the other side simultaneously. I have taken out a patent for it, and call it 'Hooker's Patent Selfanimated Philanthronic Frying-Pan.\(^1\) We will set up a manufactory of them, which will operate, not less to our own personal emolument, than to the general advastage of mankind. I calculate that in about three years their use will become universal over the globe, increasing greatly the comfort of polished nations, and extending the benefits of civilization and refinement into regions upon which their light never before dawned. An advance of $20,000 on your part will be sufficrent. There is not another man in the State whom I would allow to participate with me in such a money-making conceru." Mr. Hooker possessed a wonderful character for cunning and party, and the scheme seemed to me plansible. "Everybody." thought [, "is food of baseo and eggs, so that the thing ean not fail to succeed." I produced the $20,000 (about that sum having been left me in cash by my father), and the manufacturing operations commenced.

I next proceeded to build a fine house, and to sell my large pleasation, in order that I might buy another, the situation of which I liked better. This business it intrusted to Mr. Peleg Phips, a Yeakee lowyer of great chill in drawing deeds and seeing for into people's characters. He soon effected a sale at $60,000, and I directed him to make out the deeds and receive the money.

My most infinited friend was John Bannsy; we had been almost raised together, and were sworn bottlers. He came one menting and requested me to become his security for $12,000. "There is no risk whatever," said he; "I am going into a speculation by which I will make three times as much in three ments." Although I doubted for a moment my heart rejected the movemthy thought. "Is not Bannary my dearest friend?" considered I, "and shall I heistate to make a fortune for him, when only my assistance is necessary to accomplish it !!! Thus reasoning, I signed the papers?

Nothing was now warms to me but political consequence. I resolved, therefore, to offer for the Legislatine. My friends assured me that I would be elected, and I myself extertained not a doubt.

These different matters, of course, occupied a considerable time, and my wedding day had now nearly actived. How well do I remember Tuesday, the 13th of October, 18-, a day into which so many important events were crowded! I arose and dressed myself for the first time to my new house, which was just finished. I was conscious that morning of an extraordipary elation of the spirit. I strutted around the mom, singing my favorite song of John Anderson my Joe. "Doubtless," said I, "I am the most fortanate person living. Everything flurishes with me. Here's my new house, built upon the true Grecian model: the like is not to be seen in the whole country. Then, my manufactory of frying-pass will soon be in operation at an immease profit; the sale of them will commeace next week, ten thousand having been made to supply the immediate demand. The election, too, comes on to-day, and before sunset, in my person will be contered the majesty of the sovereign people, I will take the lead in the Legislature, and my name, as the second founder of sound constitutional principles, will become famous on the pages of my country's history. And then, again, what luck it was to sell that old old plantation of my father's, with its broomstraw fields and red guilles, for $60,000, these hard times, and to get the money paid down on the nail! And, moreover, I cartainly have the firmest and eleverest friend in the world, What is there upon earth that John Ramsay would not do or risk for me? And then, to crown all, in three days I am to be married to an angelic girl, whom I adore, and who adores me! But lovely as you are, my Cyuthia," continued I, in a pleasing apostrophe; "possessed as you are of all beauty under heaven, even your transcendant charms of person weigh little in my estimation compared with the qualities of your mind and heart. It is on account of your matchless virtues that I so deeply love you; perticularly the pure, devoted, and diminerated affection with which you regard me: an affection which I know will remain forever the same, even should in the treed by any possible length of time or changes of fortion. In this proper is to the proper of the contion, and blessed in fined-king and in love, what have I upon earth to wish for more? I thus speke in the vanity of my heart, as I reflected on the prosperious state of my refures.

Early in the day the election come on a loade a speech thirty or furly minutes long, which I had compased according to the rules of Creen, very much to my own satisfaction. My opponent was Colonel——, an old electionester. He spoke three hours and a half—rowed that if he were elected every man in the district should have a god mine on his land and a reilired by his door, and that constables and sheriffs should he totally abhished. The consequence was, that, upon counting the roses. I was seven houdered behind.

O may way from the court-home I passed by the store of my friend and partner, Mr. Blooker. On approaching it I perserved a cowed gathered withou hand heard the roise of an auctionner. Mr. Blooker, in seemed, had disappeared, and his property was then being sold for his debt. A few thousands of the patent drying-pans formed the most conspicuous article. They were sold for next to nothing, amid the rolicule of the assembly, who declared themselves resolved to whick to the real good old figing-parant their forestokers. My $20,000 was good:

This was rather unpleaseat, to be sure; but I cared no great deal about it, while I had early thousand dollars in each left. "However," thought I, "I may as well go to Mr. Phipps and take that musey into my own possession. It is perfectly safe in his hoods, no doubt, but there's no use in trusting a man too for." Thus thinking, I went to his office—but I was too late.

Mr. Phipps, tea days before, bad left home, under prefesse of attending court in another district; instead of which he took the road to New England, bearing with him my $60,000, and various other smaller sums with which he had been intreated. I was ruised without remeity! No doubt by that time Mr. Phipps was safe in his native land, receiving the applicases and enjoying the entry of his countrymen, for his industry and enterprese in the South.

I cooks that, as finding usyelf thus suddenly reduced to poresty, I was for some moments almost horro-struck. My nationally hardy temper and sanguine spirit, however, soon enabled me to oversome the feeting. It was true, all my money was gone, and I had no property left but my new house. But I had many friends; I possessed youth, health, and, I helieved, talent; and the world was before me, with its various mines of wealth and fields of house. A short effort restored to me lolerable composure.

I had that morning directed a sumptious dinner to be prepared at the tavern, and had invited my friends, in order to celebrate the victory which I doubted not I should by that time have obtained. I now repaired to it, and endeavored to do the honors as well as if nothing had happened. The dinner itself, however, was treated with much more respect than I was; for my consequence seemed to be singularly diminished in the last few hours, and my friends took little trouble to conceal their original of my folly in being swindled out of my money, and my vanity in supposing that I could be elected to the Legislature. Ample justice in the mean time was done to the provisions; and the wine being excellent, several of the company at leagth became ristous and quarrelsome. Among the rest, my bosom friend John Ramsay grew so elamorous that I found it necessary to interfere. At this John felt himself highly insulted, seized a huge bone, threw it at my head, and knocked out my right eye.

A sorgeon who was prevent half dressed the wound, and I went home. When I actived there, I found my house and farmitone in the passession of the sheriff. During my absence they had been seized to pay the debt for which I was security for John Ramssy. I was tald to find acorder indexing.

I torned my steps toward the dwelling of my Cytalia, and ealmed myself by the assurance that not fate itself could deprive me of hee love. "What matters is," thought I, "while Cytalia is will mine, for the loss of wealth, friends, and funne? These are things which are the sport of change and future. Nothing on earth is constant, except woman's love. Even though deprival of all else, in your onestant smiles, my Cynthia, in your unafterable devotion, I will find abundant oursolation. In your furthful arms I will take reduce from the sources of misference, and will think myself supremely blost. Perhaps Herven has those afficietd me, early to enable you more completely to prove the purity of your love." As these redicences passed through my mind, a note was put into my hand; it was nearly folded, and written in a beautiful Italian a hand, by this effect:

"Fare has decided that we must part. Take my last adieu, and spare my existility the pain of seeing you more. "Gravens Augenium Spurma."

Heavens ! was this possible? Everything else I had borne as become a man. Without a sight land seem my projects of ambition overtimed; I had supported the cold-hearted perildy of my friend; for the loss of my property I had someed to gritere. These things were dust trides, in my estimation, while I had a twenth then all. But that, also, was now youe. She whom I had no finely worshiped, as the presentiteation of all torcliness are all truth—the for whom I would, at any moment, have accounted it too traces happeness to die—the to whose love I looked for consolication for the loss of wealth, that treachery of frenching, and the wrongs of foctore—sie, too, had betrayed and forsalies me!

This was more than my sool could endone. I wandered, in the obscurity of the might, I knew not whither. Rage and despair had taken possession of my heart. I threw myself upon the have earth, and powered from hitter imprecases against Heaven, Cynthia, myself, and all mankind. "What a pity," exclaimed I, as length, "that there's no such thing, in these times, as selling one's self to the derail." If Oid Not could now appear, he might extantily get my sool cheap."

CHAPTER II.

"What will you take for it <sup>30</sup> said a low, strauge, airy voice close to my side.

There fell upon me a deep terro—the mysterious, nodefloable scussion of shuddering and dread by which the senses of a mortal confess the approach or the presence of a being from the nationern world. My hair stood upright and cold drups gathered upon my forehead, while a custling thrill ran through my reins and seized upon my heart. In undescribable are and fear [ gazed around.

First I perceived two wild eyes, of most terrible intensences, that had fixed their keen beams upon me. Near them I could discent features of superactional size—a gloomy bow, cheeks famowed with ears and searred by violence, and a lip of mingled pide and malice. Around them, and over the bigh yale forethand classered long disordered trackets of shining black hair, that designed, with its soulty sorts, the strange sholows of the construction.

The night was of pitchy duchness, and I was able to see this smeth only by means of a dull glow of wavering light, which the object itself shed immediately around it. The whole countenance beamed with no nodescribable and almost unimaginable suspect of mingled majesty and hidronesses. The face seemed at one moment radiant with divisio intellege, and then owithly doubted by the Carbest passons. The creature appeared to be nothing less than a mighty pitch, fallen from some lufty attain of glory and of blies, as he stood before me in the gloomy grandear of supernal govers and beauty degrated and obscured.

"What will you take for your soul?" said he. "I will give you a good price. I am master of the treasures of air, of earth, and of sea, and rule all that they contain. Speak your demand, and it shall be greated. Do you desire to be supreme in power—or unbounded in riches—or transcendent in knowledge—or happy in love—or victorious in war."

Thus far, my eyes had been so completely fascinated by the glearing visage of the spirit, that I had not turned them to the rest of his person. By this time, however, my server having bosome asmewhat mitigated, and my senses more composed; the light, too, horrong grown stronger as he had approached closer to me in speaking, I was able to view hum more distinctly.

I now percived a singular and ludierous incongraity between the upper part of his figure and the rest. The body was large and compolent and the legs diminutive, like those of an old government. He had on a blue cost, fair topped boots, and a pair of greasy enclarey breeches, through a hole to his part of which emerged a long bleak hall, that designed and enriched about, as he spoles. Upon the horders of his juwa gow a pair of most tremendous whalkers, blueckened with another and singed by fire, that hong down almost to his wait.

Heaven, which I had so lately almost biasphemed, had deinvered me into the power of some averaging fixed; and the despair, with which I was then possessed, had been bandshed at once by the extremest terror. The latter feeling had been gradually mitigated by the behavior of the personage himself, whoever he might be; and now, as I discovered, by the sight of his vulgar and hadientus attitudes, that he was nothing more than Old Nick, my relief was infinite. I plucked my courage, and resolved to show the entern and descript of man-

When this horrid thing first appeared, I knew not but that kind that I was not afraid of him,

"What will you take for your soul <sup>got</sup> said the demon, the third time.

"You old rascal," said I, "do you suppose I have no more sense than to sell my soul to you !"

"Why, as I happened aeridentally to be passing by, just now, did not I hear you offer to do so ?"

"I was not in earnest. Letill trust in Providence."

"Trust in Providence," said the demon. "Inc. ha, ha is 1-cliss is a pectly specimen of human folly. Here's a follow with his money all gone, his misteres faithless, his friends treacherous, his eye knocked out, himself mixed and undone and deceived in every manner possible, and he still table about his trust in Providence! Trust to me, and you shall be better treated. I will reward you with more than your postelful fancy ever wished for, in its wildest dreams."

"You need not expect to eatch me," said 1, "I know who you are,"

"It is unaccomable," said the demon, in a mortified tone, the W I should have got so had a character, when I have always been so housed in my deathings. No one can say that I wave failed to falfill my contracts. To be sure, all my hargains have a condition to them, and, when that is windered, I are somewhat exact in chanting the furfait; but I server that moves than is fairly my own. I will now, six, make you a very threat proposal, and it will be your own fault if it do not prove of advantage to you. I will give you as much money, or anything else, as you desire, merely on condition that you say a paper binding yourself never to be married."

This was a tempting offer. Where could be the least barm in my accepting it? To be sure, it was not to be doubled but that the demon, notwithstanding his fair talk, designed something evil; but it was evident I would expose myself to no risk whatever. Not marry! Why, after my recent experience, that was an act of folly to which I was certain that nothing in mortal shape could possibly beguile me. As to the morality of the thing, I could see no objection to take the demon's money, so that I made a good use of it afterward. Indeed, for that matter, would not the act be actually commendable, as drawing from the infernal coffers, and applying to salutary purposes, funds which otherwise would undoubtedly be made the means of accomplishing much evil? Coordering, therefore, that I might derive great benefit from the hargain, without subjecting myself to the slightest possible danger, I resolved to accept the proposal.

Having come to this determination, the bargain was som concluded. The demon, using an inkluen which he always carries field to a button-lock, forwup a bond, to which I put my name. I was to be furnished with as much money as I might demand, and my eyr was to be cured, upon condition that I should not get matried. If, at the end of thirty year, I was found with a wife, my soul was to be furdated. The demon unstanly healed my eye; then, stamping upon the earth, a suberdinate equiti hypeared at his squal. "Kalond" said be, "attend upon this gendlema; supply him with as much gold as he asks for, and execute all him orders." The demon, then, throwing the bond into one of his immose exact pockets, both of which were stuffed full of papers, and howing courtously to me, disappeared. I directed Kalond to assume a human form, as my servant, and, followed by him, returned into the form.

CHAPTER III.

HERE was I, at once in possession of exhaustless wealth and supernatural power! I had acquired it all, too, upon the cheapest terms possible—upon the easy condition of never marrying! an act to which, so far from baying the least inclimation, scarcely the whole earth could have brited me. Thus the circumstances under which I was about to commence a seemd career in the world were even more farmable than those which had at first attended me. It was true that some of the brightest of my youthful dreams had been dispelled, and passing, as is the woot of enthusiasts, from one extreme to its opposite. I now had little faith in the honesty of man, and note at all in the constancy of woman. Although the earth, therefore, no longer shone to my eyes with the freshness of its virgin beauty, yet still it presented enough, either to woo to pleasure or excite to ambition. For I was still in my one-andtwentieth summer; I had at my command boundless rickes, and a portion of the power of the javisible world, and muse was a temper which regarded oothing as impossible. Where was the path of enjoyment which I might not hope to tread, or the height of power or fame which I might not aspire to astend 3

Attended by Kalouf, I removed to the city, and resolved that I would fully explore the gay world, and satiste myself with its pleasures, before setting about my more serious purposes. The splender of my appearance, and the reputation of vast wealth which I soon acquired, readered on exceedingly conspicences. For some numbs I devoted uspeal chiefy to the purcuit of amountment, and filled a space in the eyes of the time would sufficient to have satisfied any ordinary vanity. During this time various adventures occurred to me, some of which were readered very curious by the maneuvers of my diabelical attendant. To reduce them, however, would require more time from me, and probably more patience from my readers, time either can bestow. Passing them over, therefore, I will proceed to those incidents which had a more inmediate effect in determining my destiry.

My early habits had rendered me exceedingly ford of hunting, and I devoted much of my lessure to it. On one occasion, while I was on a distant expedition a deer of extraordinary size and beauty suddenly appeared before me. His enormous antlers, with little less than twenty branches upon each, showed him to be such a patriarch of the words as I had scarpely ever heard of, even in the traditions of the eldest hunters. Through the whole live-long day did I and my staugeh dags follow him, excouraged by frequent glimpses, though he would never allow me to get quite near enough for my gun to take effect. At length, when the sun had nearly set, my perseverance seemed about to be rewarded. The deer steed, less than thirty years off, with his broad side turned fairly to me. I raised my good rifle, that had never failed me. even at three times the distance took exact aim, and fired. The result was amazing and unaccountable. At the report of my gun the deer vanished! He was nowhere to be seen, either dead or alive!

Associated, wearied, and disappointed, I stood for some minutes pushering on this straces occurrence. In the actor of the pursuit, I had wandered for from any tract with which I was acquainted. Upon looking around, however, I was almost consolled for my versious advantum by the beauty of the seese into which it had led me. I must include myself in "the luxury of describing it.

It was a sectuded valley, surrounded by stopendous mouxtains. On one side they rose in vast and irregular precipices, in the fissures of which clung the laurel and the ivy, supplying the place of all other rendure with their deep and changeless green. "In other directions, their swelling shapes were reared gradually upward, and threw into the sky a more soft and distant outline; their broad and slanting sides clothed to the summits by the varied growth of the Southern forests, the foliage of which, just breathed on by the coming autumn, displayed such gorgeous trats and mellow shades as Claude or Salvator might have in vain attempted to rival with their divinest hues. Numerous brooks, falling in extaracts from the hills around, formed by their mingled and sparkling waters a stream which wandered along the plain, and then murmured away through an opening to the west. Numberless and nameless wild-flowers bloomed around, and seemed to droop their heads over its banks, as if to gaze, with something like human vanity, upon their images reflected in the glassy wave beneath. Gigantic trees of many species grew thickly around, and spread above a escopy through which only a few wandering beams of the apon-day suo could penetrate. Never in classic Greece or Italy did aymph of the stream or of the forest lave her limbs in more crystal waters or roam through a more lovely and secure retreat. But that which in my eves gave to the scene its most peculiar charm, was the aspect of other stillness and wildness which it wore, and the total absence of anything to indicate that it had ever before been approached by man. It seemed as if it lay before me undisturbed since the day of its creation—that gone was the first step which had ever trod its silent glades and sacred depths, and mine the first eve that had ever gazed on its virgin solitude.

I seared myself on the trunk of a fallen tree, and had remained for some time absorbed in contemplation of the objects around me, when soldenix, on the opposite side of the narrow stream, I beheld a young half beautiful persond imagination. She was writing on the boah, as if rotending to errors it. This, in the ordinary state of the water, would have been perfectly easy, but it happened to be now swellen advocation. Nevertheless, there were as many fragments of mack streamed insorphless, there were as many fragments of mack streamed insorph the channel, and but little apart from earth other, that it required only a slight exertion to pass over them. At least so seemed to think the mountain symph, for with a light step and a careless air she legan to symap moses. The tops of the rocks, lately bathed by the flood, affinded an insecure facting, and betayed one of her steps! She fell into the rapid current, and was swept down to the deep water below. For me to plungs in and bear her to the shore, required but an instant.

The beautiful late, not having been rendered insensible by the water, som recovered from the terms of the accident, and proved forth her graduade to me, in the most artlent language.

1, too, theaked the providence which had made me the instrument of acting so much loredness from an early grave. Her name, she hald me, was Laure Douglas. Her father's house, to which I accompanied her, was not for fishent, the forest having proviously hidden in from my view. I remained there for some time, delighted with the kindness and learning of the futher and the heauty and intelligence of the doughter.

One day Leara asked me for some resses to put into her book. I retired, and summoned Kalouf: "Kalouf," said I, "I have promised a young lady some poetry: I am a poor them of the me."

"Su," replied he, "you have called on me at a fortunate moment: I hoppen to have now in my pecket an old which I lately made to my sweetheart down in Pandemonium, to whom I am to be married shortly: I will transfer is to you."

"What!" said I, "do the people there get married? I thought they were mischable enough without that."

"Certainly, being of the same series as on earth, they must either marry or do worse. But, as they mere die, it would be too great a hardelop to make them live together forever: the law therefore is, that they may aeparate, at the end of a thousand years, if they should have become tired of one noother in that short period." been matried only five times. These verses, with some slight alteration, I suppose will suit your purpose, as they have been much admired in Paudemonium, and have procured me a considerable reputation among the wits there. Here they are.

TO HOKEEGOLFA.

My brimstone bride, my black arch-fiend,
Thy diabolical charms I adore;
Thou loreliest of all the powers malign
That ever yet cross'd the deep Styx's shore!

Of all the myriads of fiendish maids,

Who people the sulphurous depths infernal,
And roam through its dark and dismal shades,

Thou art, I will swear it, the greatest belle.

Already, my love, I've laid in a supply Of various things that house-keeping requires, And soon we at cooking our skill will try On Tarifites, morderers, theree, and liars.

On some fresh and newly-caught sinner each day How sweelly and comfortably we will dice, From his bones teat the quivering flesh away, And quaff the red streaming blood for wine!

Our table shall groun with fierce Georgans in speads, And South Carolinians o few times a year, And also Virginians, food worthy of gods— Bot never a Yankee shall there appear,

For Yuskers, though once considered dainty, And thought to be soce and servery meat, Bare now became too detectly pleary, For even the realizants demon to eat. In pleasures coording what were can relate, In love and in this forever we'll live on, And people the growing informal estate With many a little let out the deemon!

&quot;You impodest rastal," exclaimed L "to suppose that this would suit for Miss Dauglas. Go to work and see whether you can't give me semething with less fire and brimstone in it, and rather more in the style of this earth."

Kalonf retired into a corner and in about on hoor returned.

Kalouf retired into a corner, and in about an hour returned with the following:

TO LAURA.

Sweet Laura! if thou will be mine,
I'll ever thy adorer prove,
And worship at thy beauty's shrine
With pure and everlasting love.

Store first on me thy beauty beaut'd,
Thou reignest on my memory's throne;
Of thee alone I've thought and dreamed,
My heart hath beat for thee alone!

Stern Fate will spare not even thee, And Time with rapid wing meres on; Then give, fair mand, thy charms to me, Ere life's young loveliness be gone.

And then to some sweet summer isle,
Or blooming solitate, we'll go,
Where Nature wears a ceaseless smile,
And winds of winter never blow—

Where sum are bright, and skies are blue, And gusking fountains pure and clear, And flowers of never-fading kne With Languid fragrence fill the air,

Far from the cold, the proud, the vain,
Who fill the world's tamplituous scene,
Exempt from volget care and pain,
Our days shall gilde away serene.

The rest forgot of human race, Nor heeding else beneath the sky, Each to the other shall the place Of parents, kindred, friends, supply,

Oh joy, all other joys above!

To share thy every smile and sigh—
Possess thy first and latest love—
And with thee live, and with thee doe!

"This will not do yet, Kalond," said I, "it is now on the other extreme, and is no sentimental; see whether you can't strike out something between the two," Kalonf now seemed to go to work still harder, and in three hours produced the following;

TO LAURA.

Thine eyes do not the sun eelipse;
Thy breast no mountain snow discloses;
Nor are thy red and dewy lips
Made out of robies, or of roses,

Thy brow is not the fail-orbed moon; Thy voice is not the sephyr's sigh; Thy smile is not the blaze of moon, Illumining the earth and sky.

Thy form is not composed of dreams, Such as wild Fancy off displays, Computated of the sun's bright beams, Or woven of the mon's pule rays.

But, Laura, thou art lovelier (ar, When on thy breathing form I gaze, Than if thou wert the brightest star, That ever yet in heaven did blaze, Girls who are formed of dreams and flowers, Such as the idle poet fancies, Walk not upon this earth of ours, But only glitter in romances.

would not give one smile of thine, Or slightest touch of thy soft band, For all the shapes, bright and divine, That fill the realms of fairs Acad.

Thy charms, thaut Heaven, are true and real, And therefore is it I adore thee; Ten thousand goldesses ideal Would all to nothing fade before thee.

"This is rather better, Kalouf," said I; "you have stolen a little of it, but I suppose it will have to do." Two or three days afterward. Kalouf came to me and asked leave of absence for a short time in color that he might go down to the infernal regions and get married—invoting me at the same time to go with him to the webding, which he assured me would be very sploudid, as he was to espouse the daughter of a proved and rich family. This was rather a startling proposition. Kalouf, however, pledging himself to take care of me, and to bring me haded again in select, any connectly included me to agree to it, and we set off for Pardemonium.

CHAPTER IV.

The entrance to the infernal regions. I found, is through a very large eave in Kentucky. That is to say, the one appropriated to the United States; for each considerable district of the earth has belonging to it a separate road, for the convenience of its own citizens alone. This cave was formed of a multitude of different passages, which, after turning and twisting about in a most labyrinthine manner, for twenty or thirty miles, at length all met together and became one exceedingly broad and welltrodden road. It was brilliantly illuminated with gas, and no torrocke or railway was ever half so smooth. Kalouf and I were traveling rapidly down its deep declivity, having already proceeded many miles, when suddenly we heard behind us a prodivious clatter. It was caused by the ghost of a Yankee peddler, who was journeying to the other world, with his eart of number and other notions. The ghost soon overtook us. and showed himself to be fully as impodent and inquisitive as if he were still alive.

He immediately set to work to find out who I was and where I come from.

"This is sorter a stantinelickelor road, stranger, by gooly," suid be,

"Yes, rather so."

Ligness, Mr., you've come a long way 90

"Not very many broadred miles."

"I expect, may be, you're from the North?"

"No. I am not."

"Did you come by the Paint Mountain, or over the Ohio River?" (to trace my route by these landmarks.)

"Neither."

"Hogs and beef cattle sell tolerble law now. I guess?" (to ascertain whether I was a Western mao.)

"I think it quite probable."

"I suppose, Mr., you've had a good cotton crop this year ?"
"I understand that the crop was abundant in Carolina and Georgia."

"I recken, may be, they raise tobacco in the parts you come from 917 (thinking to track me to Virginia.)

"They are fond of tobacco there."

"I guesa, steangers," continued the Vanker, "you harea" more of you never been in this country we're going to, before, have you? "I'd like oo know what kind of a pace his fortradin" down there. You see, clout two hours ago, ald Mr. Death come for me. He tak me by sich a susprise I belief mech time to get ready. Boras I was job leeged to come anyhow, I might as well try if I couldn't make somethin' on the road. So I gathered into my cent some beels, and motneys, and tho caps, and other mouses. I calculate I'll make a pretty tolerble considerable speck on what I've got along. You don't know how much a piece to crops fetches in these parts, does you?"

I previved, meanwhile, that the Yaskee continually kept his eyes down on the road over which we were passing, and industriavely raunited the numerous marks on its surface. I loquised the reason. "Why?" said he, "there's old Nebemish Perthones, he's been own' me a niceptone for about eighteen years. I rection I've noted him for that niceptone a thousand times. And do you think the bateful stampent didn't push of at last without paring it? He died about two hours often me. I'm lookin' to see if I can't find his truck. He'll have to git into a tampation bor place, but what I'll have that ninepasse yet, sonehow?"

Traveling thus in company with the Yankee, at length we reached the River Styr. There was old Charon, with his boat, roady to take as series. Be demanded twelve and a holf exist from each of us for ferrings. The Yackee in with higgled nearly had an hour, endeavaring to get him to take a ten-cout press. This point was no source orranged, than it appeared that a matter of much more consequence was to be settled. Charm, who is custom-house officer, as well as keeper of the feary, seeing the public's parcel of merchandise, proceeded to lerry a heavy turn'il upon it; which, by dust of minimums, approximents, etc., was made to amount to about two hundred and thirty per coat. This the Yackee was maddle them to be seized for the heards of the infernal treasury; and, driving the peddler into the boat, see and for the opposite shore.

that manifested by the Yankee, at the unexpected destruction of his mercentile projects. I doubt not but their the separation of him and his peddling coar was includely more painful than that which had persionsly occurred between his soul and his body. He stood in the hindrone send of the boat, with ourstreached arms, and phonos cries, and streaming eyes riveted upon his lost cort, as it remained as the beauth, until the thirk and pesillential frag, which those gloomy waters remainedly cast upward, at learth hid it from his sight.

Never did I behold so deep a consternation and despoir as Meauville, our boot giblel slowly over the black, sluggob stream which encircles the regions of the dammed. Its burid waters were thickly peopled with lungs studes, and toods, and dragous, and crossibles, and every other hideous massier which is born of the alime of a corrupt and patterfiing flood, so numerous that we could somely force a possage, between them. They glazed upon no with their faces eyes and easenly stretched their frightful juws as we passed. Suddenly, while looking among them, the face of the Tarkee glasmed with a new and intense delight, at sight of an object which be accidentally discovered. It was a large conter, that intensitionby, and in an evil hour for itself, use to the surface, only a few feet distant. The creature, however, seemed instinctively to know the enemy of its race, and as briskly as possible, retreated toward the bettom. It was an abjest upon which nothing living could look without a shudder, and into which it seemed that not even a ghost could repture without destruction. Nevertheless, the Yankre plunged in head-foremest. At the sight of a native of Connecticut the moisters, lately so fierce and hungry, scampered away in all directions, tumbling over each other in their fright. The dark flood closed over the pediller and concealed him for a short time from view. At length he emerged bearing triumphantly aloft the captive "cooler," and regained the boat. Seating himself to the button, with his back to his fellow-voyagers, he took a jark-kmfe out of his pocket, and fell hosily to work. The sound of much entting and scraping was heard, but his operations could not be seen, At the first habitation, however, that we reached after crossing the river, the Yankee produced and offered for sale an article which he called "an elegant tortoise-shell comh." He sold it for a high price to an old woman who had died of love and green apples,

Proceeding into the interior, we soon reached the judgment, we seem of old Branchestruck, where seature is passed upon all who arrive in the infertual dominions. The court was sitting, and business seemed to be carried on with a dispatch quite until or arrived on with a dispatch quite until or arrived on a dispatch quite until or arrived one of the constallers will not at:

"VIRGIT, HOSKINS!-VIRGIT, HOSKINS!"

"Here." answered the Yankee peddler, quaking up to the RESOLUTIONS: "It would occupy me a week, Histons, to go through all the charges against you. I really an getting entirely out of patience with New England, for it gives me more trouble than all the rest of the world put together. You are sentenced to be thrown into a lake of boiling molasses, where nearly all your countrymen already are, with that same old grindstone field to your neek."

After the Yankee had been thus disposed of, there were a few other cases. Among the rest, an old Virginian was ocedement for fishing on Studay; a Kentockina for horse-stealing; a Georgian for hard sweezing; and a South Carolinian for taking part with the General Government equinst his own State.

CHAPTER V.

LEAVESG the court of Rhadamanthus, we now proceeded on our journey. Our destination was not into the terrific interior of Pandemonium, but to one of the provinces on its borders, milder to climate and less fearful in aspect. To the left hand, as I passed along, stretched a vast ridge of mountains of immeasurable height, that seemed to have been thrown up as a Darrier to that portion of the infernal dominious. Their summits were entirely above my view. Their midway rocks were bare and blackened; continual thunders rolled around them; and incessant flashes of the fiercest lightning played against their blasted sides. Deep caverns pierced their base, whence issued the elements in their strength. Furious winds reared out of some, while others vonsited forth terrents of molten minerals, or volumes of murky and sulphurous flame. Oceasionally, through a few gaps in the mountain, I could eateh slight glimpers of the region beyond, but it was railed in so deep a gloom as to hide its chief horrors from my sight. I could dimly discern rivers and seas of liquid fire, of which the ever-beiling waves were tossed and uptorn by the strengest whirlwinds. Distant as I was, it seemed to'me that the abyes was thickly peopled with forms that flitted through it; and I beard, or funcied that I heard, their wailings, even above the rear of the warring elements around them. From time to time, as a gleam of lund light would flash through the darkness, a volcane blaze forth with fiercer fury, or the bread bosom of a burning lake be lit up with a ruddier glow, I would see such sights of horror and of dread as far exceed all human power, either of imagination of description or of belief. But they were things which may not be named in this upper world. Yet all that I did see, being merely upon the borders of the seene, seemed to be nothing in comparison with what raged beyond!

Turning farther from this frightful region, we now entered a country much more earthly in its appearance. Indeed, any one who will travel through certain portions of North or South Carolina, in the mouth of August, may see districts little less tot and desolute. The stad was three deep, the annuaphere oppreservely warm, and the earth purched and shadeless. The traveling too, was rendered dangerous by the deep coulputs which abounded is every direction. Springs and streams of hapid sciplaar were very numerous, but thring my whole journer in Pandemonium I saw not a single drop of water, and there appeared to be a great neurity of all other finits. I believe I may safely sar, that if there be any vice from which the inhebitions are free, it is that of hard dirakting.

After a journey of six or eight boars, in the course of which we must have to received many hundred miles, not length we exched the behistation of the parents of the brild. Every, thing about it bendered arison-rate pride and ranky, and the excilled notion which the family entertained of their consequences and gentlity. A nonzerous company of the most find-menable personages in that quarter of Pandemonium was fast assembling. Too lury to me their own wings, some come mounted on large crives or voltages, others trotted up on the backs of tigers or because, while the old women came trooping through the air on bromsnides. All things indicated that a most operations follow was about to the place.

Among the various preparations which met my eyes, I was particularly struck with a sort of barbecoe that was cooking in the yard. Alt consisted of several dozen sinners, fresh caught from the upper world, who were roasting whole upon spits before large fires, while an abundance of red pepper was sprinkled over them. The reader must understand that such is the nature of the captives in Pandemonium, that no punishment or process to which they may possibly be subjected, ean ever put an end to their sensation and existence. Thus the operation of being reasted, carred, and eaten by a number of voracious demons, instead of destroying or diminishing greatly increases the capacity for further suffering. For in that case, each separate particle becomes endowed with a distinct life and a keener sensibility to pain; and the portions which had composed the body, scattered probably thousands of miles apart-a finger here, a rib there, a slice of the tenderloin somewhere else-are allowed no rest until they search each other out, and re-unite in their former shape; a business which can not require less than many sentences of crawling to necomplish. And it is no somer done, perhaps, than another erew of langity demone each the redimegrated sincer, and inflict upon him a repetition of the same tedours and herrif process.

Among the unlocky wights thus converted into masters, I percented several whose faces I remembered. There was a night diguitary of the bench, and nutber of a big book, upon a spit made expressly to suit him, with right point—a learned South Carolina judge, who was in the labit, while holding court, of bening his own constables when they attempted to preserve the peace—and an old women named William Smith. The most comprisous personage of them all, however, was a little hald-headed old mon, who seemed to be in a constant passion. He was increasantly societing the cooks, either for toming the spit too fact, or too slow, or for letting it remain still. Nothing could please him. He had once been, while upon earth, somewhat notorious, as a member of Congress from Rhode Island.

Presently the black fidders gave the signal for the duncing to begin. There were posent many beaux dressed most famingly, and young ladies with garmons even shorter than the entities and, rendered so famous by the Calefonian poor. Then began expering, at sight of which the most agale Frenchman would have boxed with entry, or hong himself in despoir. The much and fine was fast rising to a high pinch, and I was about to lead out Miss Holzegolfa herealf, when softenly an alarm was given, "The enemy two upon methe enemy! the enemy! the enemy!

All now was confusion and diseasy. The denous, however, instantly readed forth, and prepared for a conregeous defense. Their numbers were by no means inconsiderable, and at their signals records poured in from all quarters. Having sallied out with the rost, I saw an invading army approaching, in hostile array, and in rast numbers. They were armed with long spindles, and a great variety of patent weapness of cursous form and contrivance. Among their numberous leaders, three seemed to be pre-eminent. Of these, the one who commanded the right wing, rode in its front, mounted on a large cow of the real English breed, and dressed in a chining soil of new broad-loth. As the still purse cocurred which precedes the crash of conditioning armies, this chieftain endeavored to assimate the courage of his followers.

- cheltan endestreed to animate the emerge of his followers.

  "Fellow-interes," said be, "of all the discretizes which have enlightened or benefited our race, that of Political Economy has achieved the most wonderful results. But whatever credit may be due to the inventors of this arbitime science, to as belongs the far higher proise of having established by it the following incontraversible conclusions:
- "1. That two and two do not make four, but something else, I have not yet exactly ascertained what,
- 2. That the higher the tax upon articles of merchandise, the lower will be the price; and that no limit can be assigned to the cheapness thus to be attained.
- . "3. That the higher the price of Northern manufactures the better for us, as it will make us rich.
- "4. That the lower the price of outon, and other Sunthers products, the better for those that raise them, as it will force them to be communical, and commy is one of the chief of the virtues.
- "All sing" continued the leader of the right wing, "is proved in that invaluable work, the Register, published by me at $5 per annum. Let us conshirt the reign of these grand principles! Look at me, my constraine! Do you see this new cost, vasisteest, and pantilous, of seperative bine brondichts!? They are a present to me from the Pawtroket Manufacturing Company. In the last ten years 1 have received in presents 2.317 coats, 1368 wandowsts, 2.561 pairs of pantilouss, 1.486 hats, and the single remineration for my services in ceising prices and manufacturies. Come on, then, my have suiders!—ealine shall soon sell for two dollars a yard, and each of you shall be dossed as fine as I mil!"

The leader of the left wing was mounted on a large sheep, and he hore in the one hand the Olive-Drowel, and in the other a pumplest, entitled the Radiona. He made a speech in the same rein as that of the other commander, and then gave the word for the forces which he left to move to the charge. They had advanced only a few steps further, when they reached a small revolet of lequid sulphus. "Ah, my friends," exclumed the general, in the numeri dismay, "this must be the Bulleon—let us not pass the Rubinon." So this division of the ermy was brought to a dead laid.

Then came a far mightier spirit-vobler in form, prouder in bearing, and fleroer and more intellectual in aspect. His eye gleamed with an unboly ambition, and his countenance was obscured by dark passion, deep counting, and relentless hate, else he seemed as if he might have been an angel of light, He was evidently the commander-in-chief of the whole host. He rode upon a large Keatucky boar, that upreared his bristles, and scattered the foam from his long, keen tusks, as his rider spurred him furiously about in marshaling the army. His hanner was a piece of course hempen cloth-in one hand he hore a knife and fork; in the other a pack of cards. He, too, prepared to speak; and the whole army was hushed in expeciation, when, at that moment, a most strange and uncouth agure rushed forward-it was the Rhode Islander, half reasted, with the spit still sticking through his body. During the confusion he had not been well watched by the cooks, and discovering that speechilying was going on, had broken loose, determined to have his share. All attempts to arrest him were ineffectual. He mounted upon an eminence which happened to be convenient, and, with vehement tone and gesture, began; "Guided by reason, man has traveled through the abstrase regions of the philosophic world. He has originated - " At the awful sounds of his voce, the whole multitride, demons and spirits of all seets and degrees, scattered in universal dismay. Every purpose was forgotten, except that of escape from the borrid noise. The mighty leader of the invading army himself was the very first to take to flight, terrified by those topes which he could not but too well remember, as they had often before afflicted him. Kalauf and I, partaking in the general panie, fled as swiftly as possible, and neither paused nor looked behind us, until we found ourselves safe back in the upper world.

CHAPTER VI.

No somer had I returned to the earth than I again visited Mr. Douglas', and remained there some weeks. Here the truth soon burst upon me, that I was again the victim of love! How could it be otherwise, when I was exposed to the fascination of such transcendent charms? Before seeing Laora I had but a slight idea of the degree of loveliness which a mortal shape may wear. In her I beheld such as was never dreamed of, even by the great artists who have embodied on canvas or in marble the form of incarnate beauty, or the inspired poets who have gazed upon her unvailed divinity. Radiant eyes-marble brow-alabaster neck-ruby lips-shape of perfect symmetrylong glossy earls of rayen bair flowing in waving wreaths over ivery shoulders-cheeks whose young and vermiel bloom seem fresher than rosebads moistened by the dew of springthese are expressions that have been often used, and, perhaps, sometimes with a semblance of truth; and are things which language can half describe, and painting can fully portray The magic of her appearance was derived from something leftier and nobler. It was not merely that her eyes beamed with a juster beside which the diamond's blaze would have been dim, but that in their pure rays the divine spirit within most divinely shone-not that each movement was perfect gratefulness, but that with all of lovely and holy which the enthusiast can facey in an angel, there was miggled the warm passion and tenderoess of earth. It was, in short, that her every look word, thought, and action was informed with a hallowing soul, which seemed almost to shed around her person a charmed atmosphere and a colestial radiance!

Even had I been less sensible than I was to the power of beauty here was such as it was impossible to resist. But what underso was this by which I was overcome? Had I forgotten the bond with the demon, to which I had subsented, and the tremendous penalty attached to its violation? Was I willing to purchase a short and fineting pleasure at the price of everlacting agains!! For the breaf possessess of so slight a thing as mortal and decaying beauty, was I about to subject impedit to an elemity of terment? These a wild reflections could not but introde themselves upon one; but whatever sage reasonurys and resolves I might make in Laura's absence, they were always instantly dispelled by the magno of her presence, and I resigned impedit to the overpowering passion which it innoted.

Yet, let not the reader do me the injustice to suppose that in my decision. I did not duly weigh the consequences. The question was, whether I should resign Laura, or, by marrying her, render myself, when the thirty years should end, forfest to the demon. I did not deliberate long. The fear of distinct to the demon. I did not deliberate long. The fear of distinct the temptation of present pleasure. It then seemed to me that the loss of Laura was the greatest of all possible errole, and that the possession of her would be cheaply parchased at easy price whatever. Would I not enjoy with her a whole loss time of supreme felicity? Had at heen only on hour or a day, perhaps I might have poudered longer; but for thirty long years I how could I bestone? I resided that I would court her and endeavor to marry her at all hearnis.

Having come to this determination, I soon corred it note execution. One fine evening we had reamed, as was our almost cally custom, note the solitode of the neighboring woods and ingened on our return rather later than usual. The sun had sunk behind the mountains, and only faintly illuminated their rounnins, and the crimen clouds above them. Amed the softmens and balm and still sanctity of the forest, outhing was beard but the quirrening of the leaves above us as the till trees wared their buggles in the automatal air, the melancholy voice of the whip-poor will, and the gealle murmaring of the waters; while from numberless and nameless strobs and whilf flowers the west wind should the blossoms, and hore to us the fragrance.

It is at the margie hour of twillight, when the son has just set, and the moon has just rosen, and the stars are begrowing to gitter in the sky, and everything looks calm and holy, that nature is most lovely, and woman's heart is most succeptible. All things around seemed to breathe the spirit of loves and to impire the feeling, and we both acknowledged the mystic influence. No hour or scene could have been more propious to me, and I failed not to avail mystif of in. I poured forth my hore to Latora in the most impositional bacquage. I doctored that I admired and valued here beyond all else or earth or in heaven. I pointed up to the most and to the stars, and swore by their solemn and seared light, that I lored her better than asyrting in this world was even loved before, and that I would thus love her to all elemity. Why need I repeat my wroning? it is enough that Lator consented to be more.

I now notalged myself so the most reptorous decease that hope and insequential could inspire. That grif was mine whom as the forwar of my enthussastic admiration I family beleved to be unequaled on earth, and not excelled in heaven. It was troe, my prospective visions were limited to a space of somewhat less than thirry years, and I knew that at the expertation of that period my folicity must some to an end, and be followed by an awful retribution. But it seemed to me that after a lifetime pussed with Laura, I could calmly endone anything that either man or denne could inflict.

I remained with her some days longer, more unable than ever to tear myself from her posenter. I will here give part of a conversation that occurred between us, not as of uself important, but heccuse it will be referred to hereafter. We were setting on the portion, lets at night, heaventh the illumined heavens, that sked upon the elevie and with their sevenest light. We gened upon the glowing stars, and exhauveledged the fully espirations, the ferrent hope, which the contemplation of them is so fitted to inspire—the fieling that we been within ourselves a spirit of which the desiry is equally glocious, and the duration for more exernal.

"I suppose," and Laura, "that you believe in the existence and immortality of the soul? What do you regard as the strongest proofs?"

"To me," replied 1, "the fact is abundantly clear, even without reserving to revelation and philosophical argument. I and easily establish it by legical deflection, but I choose to take a shorter method. Away with the theories of the metaphysicans! The existence and immunitality of the soul are things which believe, because I fed them. The Creator hunself has impressed a conversion of them upon me. I am owne of the existence of my soul precisely as I am of that of my body. I perceive us across even more pulpebly than that of my corporeal frames for the latter as usually madeserved, while the formet impress-es upon me an incessant consciousness. In short, I have the storagest proof possible, the direct evidence of sense. I fed within me am infinite spirit, which acknowledges nothing superior to itself, in capacity or direction, except the numipatent. Power who made it. Smelly that Power would not decive the creatures with rain hopes and ineffectual longings—and can have bestowed upon me the faculties of an angel for nothing less than an eternal purpose."

Some have asserted, however, that matter may be so modified as to produce all the phenomena of mind ??

"Impossible," and I to be told that the outless of Demothenes, the philosophy of Newton, the pictures of Raphael, the poetry of Milma, are nothing more than connections of trate matter? Am I to be told that all this possion and though which animate my funct—those transports of loops and four, and jor and sorrow, and hatred and despair—those lefty asystations and most desires—those wanderury of inactivations and most desires—those wanderury of inactivations and trast desires—those wanderury of inactivations and trast desires—those wanderury of inactivation at a few these soft begin innérneau the skull? Am I to believe that pure affection, and incorraptible boson, and beroic courage, and forward picts, and transcendent genins have given to them only a momentum existence, then to sold hate the same grave with the found which they informed with their fire, and to not into the some desire?

"But you and I, my love, have no occasion to discuss this topic, for we require no additional light on the subject. Here we not no our bosoms a love for each other which we feel will survive everything less deathle than heaven and elemity? Who that had a least, ever doubted that he had a soul? As for yours, at this moment do I not see it in your eyes? do I not hear it in your wive? 2 do I not feel it in your kiss?"

"I will tell you my idea," said Laura; "I believe that we burnan creatures are angels who in some manner or other forfeited their native herven, and have been banished to a grosser world, in order to pay such penalty and endure such suffering as shall reader them worthy of being restored to it. Does there not often orne to us a half-seen vision, a vague recollection, of a former and brighter existence? What is in bot a portion of the light of our lost heaven, which still lingers around us, and oversimally arrained? I doubt not but that the numberless worlds we see around us are the shotes of human creatures and angels of infinitely varied defends of human creatures and angels of infinitely varied defends to the world the sample of humans and perfection. Do you see that beautiful star yunder, just above the summitted that tall tree? I select at for my future bubuntation. You must there seek me when you come to the salar world."

This corressain, although little regarded at that time, as I have said, is now recorded because it happened to be afterward remembered.

Ireturned to the city in order to settle some necessity affairs before my marriage, which Laura had consented should some take place. Meanwhile her rouge was forever present to my thoughts, and my heart was filled with the most joyous antipations. Little did I dream how sulfly they were to be dispelled; and that fate founted me to a disappointment a thousagal times more hinter than that which had before hefallen use.

I had been absent only eight or ten days, when a messenger from Mr. Douglas informed me that Lours had been middenly taken ill, and was in the greatest danger. The messenger had been two days on the read, the distance being king or extently miles. Had Kahori been with me, I could by his power hore , texterwed the dustance on a few moments, but I had left him in the country. I mounted not fleetest lorse, and reached Mr. Douglast as soon as possible, but Lours had expired many hours before! and I could do no more than seek her gaving, and your over it here of unotherable augusts and despure.

CHAPTER VIL

I was conducted to the spot where Laura was interred. She had chosen to be buried, not in the crowded and monumental churchyard, but in the quiet solitude where I first met and last beheld her. There, in the midst of the scenes which, when living, she had loved to frequent, the relies of the beautiful maid reposed. The lofty trees beneath whose shades she had so often passed the summer noon in maiden meditation, now waved their leafy branches above her grave; the ailver stream that had southed her ear with its murmuring flow, now seemed to wail along its pebbly channel with a constant dirge; while the flowers which her own hand had planted breathed around their dying fragrance and shed their melantholy bloom. In unutterable anguish I threw myself upon the spot where my buried fore was laid; where, separated from me only by a few feet of earth, and a sod not yet green, now moldered that dust which had been once perfection. I felt that she whose presence alone rendered earth lovely and life delightful, was no more, and for me nothing remained but to hewail her loss with an eternal grief. Hour after hour rolled on, while, regardless of the flight of time, I remained stretched upon that sacred grave, pouring forth alternately the lamentations of love, the groans of anguish, or the imprecations of despair, The long day passed away, the evening came and departed, and was followed by the glosmy twilight, until at length the silver moon and diamond stars glittered in the midnight sky, As I looked around on the calm of nature and the solemn magnificence of the bravens, a softer and less vehement feeling stale insensibly over my thoughts, "Ye wild solitudes," I exclaimed, "ye lefty hills, and ancient woods, and gushing fourtains, and springing flowers, we can sympathize, we can weep with me, for you know what I have lost! Through your deep recesses my Laura delighted to wander, or to repose beneath your quiet shade; and ye were witnesses when she vowed to me the first love of her virgin heart. But never again will ye behold her nymph-like step and graceful form,

That shape of beauty now moders calify in the gates, and over it my beast must break or my teans never cease to flow? Ye break and everlasting stars? it is to your realms of light and love that bee pure spirit has seconded. But if the remembrance of surphing cardialy ever enters an angul's thoughts, or timils am angel's heart, I know that even in that blisful heaven I am not forgotten. Perhaps, at thus moment, from some one of youter radiant worlds, my Leans looks foodly upon me with pixtying and celestial love."

As I thus spoke, my eye accidentally turned to a single star in a particular quarter of the heavens. I recognized it to he the one which Laura had once fancifully selected as her future habitation. As this recollection flashed into my mind, I instantly resolved upon the most during project that ever mortal omeeyed, and which I alone of all men was able to execute. I determined to leave this world, and to seek the distant and happy sphere where my Laura now resided. I summoned my attendant devil. "Kalouf." said I. "I have good reason to suppose that Laura now inhabits youder brilliant star. Put on your wings, and carry me there as quickly as possible.11 The demon gazed upward, and sighed deeply. "That," said he, "is beyond my power; my travels are confined to the limits of earth and hell; into the fair regions of the skies [ am forever forbidden to enter. All that I can do is to enable you to get there alone. Living, as I do, in Pandemonium, at the center of the earth. I have found out what constitutes gravitation, and how to modify or destroy it. This mysterious principle, which pervades all nature, is the chief enemy to free motion. You shall be no longer subject to its power," Thus saving, the demon (by a process which I do not consider myself at liberty to divulge) extracted every particle of weight from my body, and I stood upon the earth as light and free as an ethereal spirit! "Now," said Kalouf, "you know that whenever you begin to move in any direction, and meet with no obstruction, you can keep on forever with undiminished velocity. In order that you may safely reach the star which you wish to visit, it is only necessary to apply some propelling power, to be sure that you start in a straight line toward it, and to must against starvation by the way. I will see to all these, and will attend you some thirty or forty miles of the journey, to eatisfy myself that you are getting on prosperously, and keeping to the right course."

The denon then began this preparations. In an hour or two he provided a quantity of groupowder, which he deposited with great case, as as to operate in a marticular manner. Above this he placed an numerous bag of provisions, made as light as I was. I seated urpself upon the bag; he applied powder below, and as it exploided I was hanched how the air with a velocity far exceeding that of a canon-hall. Kalouf spread his broad black wings, came thing along with me (though it was as much as he could do to keep up), occasionally pushing me on one side or the other, to give the proper direction to our field.

The earth field gradually from my sight, as I few withly upward through the time expasse. My heart dilated with price and emilation as I locked down upon the diminished world. "Contemptible mortals," I exclaimed, "that inhabit profer lump of durt, I resource all fellowship with you, and bid you and your rile world heavell factore. While you are chained to the dull earth, and erawl like worms along its surface. I mount into the bise, and ream at pleasure through the suppline fields of heaven. Prosessed at once of the substance of a mortal and the freedom of a disembodied spirit. I can dry from star to star, and explore every quarter of the universe. Perhaps I may even scale the crystal walls of heaven, and tasts before death of joys forbidden to every other mortal."

I thus spake in the vanity of my beart, as I rose triumphmally not the othereal regions. But, alsa! soon did I repent bitterly of my foolish presemption. For some time I went on quite prosperussly, and toward the end of the seventh day found myself almost in contact with the star at which I intended to stop. But, of course, I was moving in a straight line, without the power of varying its direction. Imagine my unutterable recasion and consternation, when, ofter a journey of so many millions of miles, I found that I would miss the planet by about fifteen inches! Kalouf and I had mode some slight mistake in our calculation. For several miles I passed so near to its surface that I was contacully endeavocing to grasp the tops of the trees with my hands, but, also! I could not quite reach them.

Meanwhile, as I passed along, I had a fair view of the celestial symphs who mishist that lovely size. They are, indeed, chromog beyond asything that mortal facey ever dreamed of. Were 'the sixtue that enchaots the world' suddenly minated with a sood, and it were to step from its peckeral warm with the fresh glow of young enskeen; hi would not look one thousandsh part as beautiful. I shoust bloogle one or two of them had! equal to my lost and absend Lanne. Deeply did I lement that I could not dight and pass the rest of my days in that delightful country. But the power which impelled me ownerd was shore my outnot. I took a last sad look at the fair creatures whom I was never to behold again, and was hoursed every with undiminished velocity into the regons of illimitable space.

As I traveled onward, I continually hoped that some time or other I would arrive at a stopping-place. I saw, and passed by, innumerable worlds, but was so unfortunate as to miss them all. The amazing things which I beheld in those strange and distant regions I will not attempt to relate, because they utierly exceed all mortal power, either of description or of bebef. I know not for how many months or years I traveled onward. At length I seemed about to pass the utmost limits of the creation. The planets had totally faded from my sight, and the scattered rays of a few distant stars only feebly penetrated the increasing gloom. I shuddered with agony and horror as I perceived that I was leaving forever the realms of life and light, and entering the boundless solitudes where cold and darkness still maintain their primeral empire. Suddenly my flight was interrupted by a wall of immeasurable beight. In this wall was a gate of immense size, through some slight erevices of which flashed forth gleams of the intensest radiance. Beside this portal there stood keeping goard a creature so prodigious that my eyes could not half discern his size. "You little rascal," exclaimed the grim giant, "what are you doing here, with that big bay of bread and meat? Back to the vile world from whence you come, and never again let me cutch you in this forbidden region." Thus speaking, the huge mousier seased me with his strong head. Whirling me second his head, and group full sweep to an arm at least a thousand males in length, he buried me back toward the earth with the velocity of a thunder-bolt.

I thus returned, even more repidly than I had left it, toward my native world. The giant had thowa me with so true tim that I followed almost exectly the route by which I had come. Proceeding at the rate of about ten thousand feet in a second, in eighteen months I again beheld that world of which I thought I had takes an elemal facewell. My usual fill lock seemed again to attend me for I found myself going a little too much nome off. Furtunately, however, I passed over the extent of the acroic cards, and thus come in contact with the North Pole. which projects serred thousand miles above the surface. I seared it, and arrested my flight, and then jumping off toward America. I handed in the State of Connection.

Unlockly I come down at so public a spot that my descent was waterseed by several of the inhabitions of that pour local, who instantly sented me as a conjume, and cervical me off to trial. Upon being weighed, as is usual in such cases, against a big libide, I of course was found wanting, and condensed to be borne. Hearing this sentence pronounced, I thought it was time to take to my heels; and as I goold jump as far as I pleased. That put difficulty in making my serepe.

CHAPTER VIII.

On my way back to the South I passed through Washington city. Concress was in session, and I stepped into the Senate hall, no see what was going on. Just then the Hoon. United Webser arms, in order to present a petition in behalf of the resemble Noath Webser and others, his converts and docipies. The learnest member introduced it with a most toucking resonance on this patriorich of the birth, and grandfather of letters and spelling in America.

know out too well (and here the peculiar modesty of the ingenous speaker sofficed his whole countenance with the deepest blockes) that my own poor wisage, ill-beltifug as it is to accompany a name so glorous—flavous of accordable somes, that will make the name of the country that gave him birth honored and loved in the remotest regions and times—can but little neall the mobile and gentle and intellectual linearments of the divine old man, whose particulars, opposite to the titlepage of his first great production (his spelling-book). I doubt not is engraved on the hearts of all those who hear me."

(at this trally affecting appeal I are many of the distinguished personages present lay their hands, with what they call in the French Chamber of Deputes, "one are vive sensation," upon that part of the body where Dr. Welster's image is perhaps the most legably imprinted. "The moster saw the undness tree," and felt how strongly the had struck the electric chain that bound his anticance to him. With that incomparable eloquence, therefore, which places him above all other speakers—whether he pure out his loftly strains of patientism in praise of the Hardrod Correction, or reduck the fool spirit of Stoubers disaffectsos—whether his foreble arguments seatter dismay among the supporters of a typeamical barif, or his equally powerful legic enforce its justice, its constitutionality, and its expediency—he continued in the same ingenuous strain.

"If there is anything in my poor talents that merits the smallest part of the fame with which (I can most unaffectedly say) I am overwhelmed, it is to the lessons of the immortal Dr. Webser that the given must be given.

"It is easy to see that New England always the chosen next of the most spokes good faith, and of patinism the most deword and enlarged, is destined to be as pro-uniment in learning and the elegant arts, as site already is in the Areadica simplicity and gailelessess of her manners. In short, that, joining the Durce severity to the lookin elegance, in her racely-composeded character, it is inermable that she must become the "magua persess" of traste, of learning, and of politeness to all the less fravord regions of our land. Happing for the benighted morals and inhelients of our Southern neighbors, Hearres, in lis wise and heneficent designs, has implanted in the breasts of all genuine New Englanders a sacred desire of propagating everywhere the virtues which, but for their humanizing efforts, would remain almost peenliar to themselves. Overrouning in their self-devoting labors, the most inaccessible, the most inhospitable shores-missionaries, everywhere, of the divine cause of integrity and knowledge and disinterestedness-" pilgrims," still, to every shrme where freedom may be worshiped and gain despised—they are always seen to attach themselves to no objects but the improvement of those around them, and the cultivation of an unimperchable character. I have known foll many a lawyer of the finest talents, abjuring the ease and dignity of a competence in Hartford or Providence, to fix himself in some such degraded place as Richmond or Charleston, merely that he might impart to the low and vulgar practice of their courts the nobler arts of a New England pleader. Yes, such is their zeal for the comfort and improvement of the poor people among whom they carry their talents and virtues, that I have often known men of the most eminent attainments, in migrating, as lawyers, doctors, and elergymen. to the South, to take their carriages full of cheeked handkerchiefs and tinware (articles there much used by those who are rich enough to buy them), and these they distributed along the roads where they passed, for a price next to nothing,

It is time that the elegant and profund grains of New England should be emaceipated from the social occupations to which it is no often continued—that the taleus stricke placed alone enlighten the rest of the nation should be at once placed above the 'rest angested domit. It is strategly mediated themselves to the good of mankind, and some all low considerations of possual gain and temporary popularity, should any longer tinguish for the want of a little of that wholesmes stimulus which the most learned political economists have consented to desominate 'money.'

"I will, at no remote day, do myself the honor of calling the attention of Congress to a general project for the advancement of learning and taste in America, by rescuing from the neglect, into which the jethous artifaces of European authors have caused them to fall, those wonderful achievements of our early writers, which gained them, in their day, such prodigious applauses, among those best of all possible judges of merit, themselves. A complete conspiracy bas, as is but too natural, combined the men of letters of all other nations, encient and modern, against a literature which, it is easy to see, is destined, som er late, to overwhelm all others. I doubt not, therefore, but that this bouse, with the same inspired patriotism which has hitherto made it so wisely postpone all advantages of the nearer generations, to those which shall exist a thousand years hence, will hasten, by forcing the scholars of the present times to adopt the true models of an original and peculiar literature, to bring on that golden are of science, taste, politeness, and religion, which Massachusetts and her peerless sisters were born to produce. A large part of the countrymay say the whole, if magnitude were measured by worthiness-is amply prepared for these measures. Were it not for the Southern States, those continual dead-weights upon everything great and glorious among us, New England might swiftly overleap the centuries that interpose between her and the fullness of her future glory, and shine at once in the acknowledged ascendancy of her consummate fame. Unfitly linked, therefore, as she is, to companions so uncongenial, some reporation is due her for this sacrifice, by which she, who might so easily be the instructress of all mankind, consents to be nothing more than the mistress and enlightener of these States,

"The design of my project is, to apply to those things which are of the growth of the understanding, the same notice and philosophical principles which have been accompanied with such dissinguished benefits, when made to act upon nor rade and industry. Nothing else will be necessary than a few effective measures of protection to our home production, in order to confer upon us a superiority as decided in moral workman, as we have already to obtained in all physical handswards. It is well known that extensive and active manufactories of all intellectual waves, from the light and early factors of the post, to the posterous and said uses of the mathematician and divine, have long existed in most parts of New England. Of these institutions it is acknowledged to be the remarkable peruliarity, that they alone give to their, pupils such a general professor, that they rarely full to be equally skillful in all the sciences and all the urss. Their scholars are generally good tubics, saddlers, shoemakers and hattens—not minformed in junery, upholstery, and shipbuilding—singularly expert as measure, show-coulters, acclitects, and cru'l engineers—excellent at the making fand else the dividingle of heen, eiter, and switchel.

"To these diversified takents, the greaver part of them add no slight knowledge in the noble and making a barguinin singing polium with the genuthe evangelical twang and audit—and in execusing a very kern though innovant inspection into the domestic seems of their angebores. These lighters and more elegant accomplishments are further advanced with many other number and genule qualities of the heart, which make them everywhere the delight and admiration of those among whom their inhabit or sejourn.

Besides all this, they are as temperate as Kentuckians, benevolent and disinterested as Objoans, intelligent as Penosylvamans, modest as New Yorkers, brave as Verginians, and generous and courteous as South Carolinans. They are invariably skilled in dentistry, surgery, and medicine-in compounding and imitating all kinds of drugs-in jurisprudence and peddling-in theology and the making of tinware. Besides their own Atthe dialect, they are occasionally able to speak, if not to write, the vulgar English of the Southern States and of Great Britain. In the other modern tongues they are so skillful as to have introduced very extensive Castilianisms into the Spanish-to have largely corrected and reformed the Parisian pronunctation—to have restored the true Tuseano-Roman speech, which had latterly begun to degenerate-and to have brought about a perfect amalgamation of Saxon and Low Dutch, which has been so long a great desiderators to German literature.

<sup>6</sup> Joining to all these eminent attainments an accurate ocquaintance with the Latin and Greek grammars, and a considerable knowledge of the smaller catechism, they are, for the most part, singularly fixed to become authors of giptone facilitation, suggraphisms, presidents of colleges, bur-keepers, excessive merchanis, lecturers on botany and autonomy, venders of wooden clocks, missinatres among the Indians and Southerners, professors of mathematics, dire kings, and dealers in a new growth of antimers.

"Their deep researches not the argebras of nature have also led them to the discovery of many astoishing screbuhow to make gun-fines not of hore, and dismonds of chanceal —indige out of floor, and chorolate and olive-all out of ground not—exwing-thread out of word, mostered out of commend, twenty-form sheets of paper out of screentes—eigens more exquisite than the gentine Havans out of each leaves, and a great variety of salutory and previous medianes out of paebors.

"I will not, because I am stree that I need not, further detain the Senate by expotitoting on the universal taleats and transes which are by the whole world acknowledged to belong to the New England character. Still less need I argue to support of the proposition which I am about to submit for your consideration, because its justice is self-evident—ins policy has been declared by this body, and has already become the settled and profitable system of the country—not the principle upon which it is founded is the inestimable principle for which our assession of "65 fought and dred, and to secure which they established this choicus Union.

"I do not propose at present to estaint my whole plan for the eccouragement and protection of Northern learning and genus, but to begin with a single and primary branch. I adopt this course, in order that those narrow-mixed opposes of everything new and useful, the people of the Southern States, and particularly of South Carolina, may be by degrees overpowered in the resistance, which I doubt not they will unguacoundly endeavor to make to it. Dy our next session the provisions of the act may be so enlarged as to embrane every other branch of letters, and extend to the prohibition of books and writings of all kinds from England and every other country. So that becenfirth we may not be indebted to foreguess for any portion of our ideas contenting murcla, history, poetry, language, physic, muthematics, politics, philocophy, grography, or any other science or subject whatever. In order to accomplish these great purposes, I offer the following bill:

- "An Act concerning Webster's Spelling Book, and to define the powers of the President.
- "Be it control by the Sente and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Americals: That on each after the their day of March near, a shall not be lowful for any boy, you, child, or unfant, or any other person or persons whatsoeree, within the limits of the United States, to have or susly their ab also not elves not of any other Spelling Book; favorated by Dr. Noah Webster.
- "See 2. The sole use of the soid spelling-book of Noth Websser being enjoyed, and the introduction of all others potablished, it is berely declared that all boys girds, infants, children, schoolmasters, parents, and guardans. Who full to use it, or sarrepointensly seek to learn from the spelling-books of Murray, Dilworth, and smiller nathors—and all practices and studies who endeavor to impact or read, any other such forbidden appliting-books—shall be considered guilty of treason against the United States, and by punished assortingly. And to secure the observance of this act, the Army and Nary of the United States are placed at the disposal of the Persoleas, and it is hereby declared to be his high and sacred duty to enforce it at all lazards."

The bill passed by a vote of 31 to 15.

CHAPTER IX.

I wow found myself, as it were, outered name into the world.

But it was a world which now contained, in its whole wide compass, nothing that I loved, except the memory of Laura.

Without her, the earth had no beauty and existence no charm.

All juy, all passine, all hope had perioded with her, and had left me no other desire than to share her place of rest. Sweeter far to me than the loffiest throne of power or the downlest cruch of pleasure would have been the repose of that quiet grave. Alike through the joyless day and the haunted slumbers of the night, one crassless anguish, one undying regret, filled every thought and every dream. The image of my buried love, cold, dead, moldering in the grave, was forever present to my remembrance. The universe was spread in a dreary calmness around me, and seemed only a wide mansoleum of her whom I had lost! An otter melaucholy overpowered me, so dark and deep that its gloomy cloud extinguished all enjoyment, and excluded all light from my soul. I sat for hours and days wrapped to totense despair, motionless, gazing on varancy, enduring a norture like that of the Titan, while the vulture memory preyed on my agonized heart. I longed for death, and was importent of its delay; but I had been alike instructed by the agenent stole and the modern Christian not to anticipate its hour. Existence, therefore, however wearsome and hateful, was to be home until its allotted period should come to an end.

The moralists of every age had taught that, in earnest emplayment in the duties of life, in active and virtuous exertion, is to be found the best autidote against painful remembrance, I resolved, therefore, to mingle again in the affairs of maskind, and hoped that perhaps the extinguished lamp of passion might be rekindled at the shrine of glory and ambition, or, at least, that the pursuit or the possession of those things which other men most covet, might supply some balm to heal, or anodyne to southe, my individual suffering. Joining in the general contest for power and fame. I carried with me an energy of purpase which nothing but despair could have inspired, and which readered me emineutly successful in acquiring all that I sought for except the oblivious which alone I desired. I explored the realms of science and philosophy, and roamed through the elysium of poetry. I entered the legislative halls, and the arena of politics, and endeavored to instruct and to benefit my country. I joined the ranks of war, and on many a wellfought field, beneath the sometimes triumphant, yet oftener trampled, banner of struggling freedom, my step was the first in the advance and the last in the retreat.

Chiefly, however, I devoted myself to the contemplation and study of manageate nature. I had always presessed an enthusiastic admiration of her charms, and I now reamed from country to country, with scarcely any other purpose than to view her under different aspects, and to gaze upon her face, forever varied and forever lovely. I beheld the sup rise from the Atlantic wave in all the gorgeous magnifisence of his ocean drapery, and his setting beams tings with rose-hoes the summits of the Alpine mountains. I steed on the far shores of the northern sess, and saw the arctic lights stream over the illumined sky, and fill all heaven with their phantasmagorial splendor. I gazed on the clear blue summer sky from the solitary forests of the Allegany, and saw the mountain eagle cleaving its deep expanse with his brood, strong pianos. I viewed the mighty rains of the ancient civilized world, and the pyr-covered easiles of the baronial ages, and the gorgeous polices of the capitals of modern Europe. I straved along the banks of the Teviot, the Tweed, the Arna and the Rhine. I wandered through England in the autumn, through Italy in the summer, and through France in the season of the viotage. I sailed amid the spice-islands of the Indian seas, and reposed beneath the educous shade of Chil's brandless forests. I reamed through the interminable prairies of the Missouri. during their early solitude, when mine was the first step, eave that of the Indian, which had ever tred the dowery waste. On land and on wave, on mountain and on plain, in sunshine and to storm. I would the loveliness of nature; and in communion with her sacred spirit, endeavared to lose the sense of my own localiness and despair. But it was in vain. It was in vain that I ransacked the realms of learning, the heights of power, the world of imagination and reality, in search of the talisms nof forgetfulness. Never, either in the society of the gay and the wise, or in the levely pursuit of knowledge, or in the daring visions of ambitton, or in the pompous Senate hall, or on the crimson battle-field, or in the crowded city, or amid the solunds of unpeopled nature-never, my buried love! wert thou for one moment forgotten or undeplored.

Finding that the world contained nothing which I could raine, and that the consuming acquish within me was rapidly wearing away my frame, and bringing my existence to its close. I resulted again to wait Laura's grave and to pass the rest of my days in solitude beside it, in order that I might at least enjoy the only melanchely pleasure which remained to nee—that of breathing my last sigh over her sales, and of mingding my own with them in death. I required to the spot, and constructed for myself a rude skelete in the recesses of the forest. Errey day I passed many thours at Laura's grave, in the indulgence of a grief which Time, envirary to his cosal want, seemed rather to increase than to asseaue. Oceanionally I endeavored to abstruct and employ my most in postical composition, and produced verses which at least possessed the ment of superity. The following are given as a specimen:

ELEGY.

Fair maid! that dolsn so early die, In blomning beauty's vernal glow; For thee shall breathe the crawless sigh, For thee the elemal tear shall flow!

Of all that once my heart held dear.
Sad thought can dwell on thee alone;
Thy image bought, and pure, and fair,
Sull regues supreme on memory's throne.

At demy morn and evening cold,

I duly to thy grave repair,

To kiss the green and hallowed mold,

And shed the sad and silent tear.

And strew the flowers that earliest bloom Around thy couch of dreamless rest, And hid the cold and ponderous tomb Press gently on thy virgin breast.

But thou, on that electual above,
Where all is peaceful, pure, and bright,
With angel wing now wander'st o'er
The boundless realms of life and light;

Or sitt'st, with starry glovy crowned, And immortality divine, Where seraphs pour their seags around Almighty Love's resplendent shripe;

Or restest 'neath the green array Of ceaseless spring's elysian shade, And dream'st eternity away, In bliss that can not diy or fate.

But if the thrill of sad regret Celestial bosous e'er may move, Thy lover is remembered yet, And pitied with an angel's love!

Oh, ne'er again can hope illume Her flame of joy within my breast; I only wish to share thy tomb, And alumber in its knolly rest.

How sweet that calm and silent sleep, Untroubled by a thought or dream! Undelt the tears of night would weep, Unseen the smiles of day might beam.

There, by no torturing memory term,

My soul all sorrow will resign—

My throbbing heart will cease to burn—

My moldering dust will max with thine!

Several times I had observed something like a human from wandering amed the trees around me, and funcied more than once that I saw the while waring of a woman's robe. But the object was so indistinct that at first I little regarded it, and thought that pechaps the motion of the foliage had deceived my vision. At length, however, it approached so near that I perseived it to be a hady of a fine person and exceedingly graneful insvenment. There was that to ber are (for the distance personnel me from seeing her features) which weemed not unfamiliar to me; or which at least, works essenthing like a vayer recollection. I approached her, but, as I did so, she retired along the path which had formerly led to Mr. Douglas' residence. I felt urgelf irresistibly impelled to obturn a nearer verw, and, baskening my steps, overhold her. She turned around. Sheerd hearvess! was it possible? evoid I believe my senses? Yes, it is, it is Loura herself; it is my own Laura—so long lisst, so deeply lamented—whom I now classped to my throbbing and transported heart!

Sereo years, it is true, had not passed without having wrought some change in her person, but to my delighted gaze she seemed ereo lorelest than ever. The flower of her early branty had now expanded into the glory of its prome. In her appearance enough of postello finishess still remained, blended with a more majestic gravefalouss of person and a lotter tone of unfollectual econosisson.

Moreal explanations ensued. It will be recollected that when I left Mr. Douglas' to prepare for my marrage. Kalouf had remained behad. From him, during my absence, Laura accelerately learned the secret of the bargain which evised netween me and the domon, and the fate which my manying her would bring upon met. Her love for me made her at once resolve that I should not incor the penalty. Knowing that argument would hereit induce me to resign her, she determined to withdraw hereif from me by pretended death. This selicine was executed, and succeeded as I have related. Site had denself witnessel, concealed at a little distance from her supposed gazes, my preparations for leaving the earth, though without any scapinto of my design until site saw me notwally take flight.

While even more than my former passion I now arged an immediate union. To this, however, there still enumed the same obstacle as before, and for several days all my pleading was ineffectual. During this time I observed, without however the still be thank of it, that Laura had several canness one-ferences with Kabloof. At length, other the last and longest of them, with a look of mingeled emission and address, the consented to be mine, and we were seen afterward and managed.

I omitted to say that since my retorn from the skies, regardless of the services of Kalzud, I had been without his attendance. It was not mail the recovery of Laure that I had again summoned him. Immediately after my marriage I called him to me. "Build one instantly," said I, "a magnifectal bruseof white match." It was fusited in two days. "Now place in my room as non-chest containing a million of guiness." This was done in an hour. "Now take yourself back to the infernal regions; I have no further recession for your service."

"You will yet see me again," said the deamn, with a sylveful sooil, as he disappeared.

CHAPTER X.

For many years afterward my career was as prosperous as possible. I lived in the most splended manner, a numerous family grew up in goodly array before me, and everything around breathed of wealth, happiness, and hinor. I had filled various important offices with applause, and was now looking to the last and the highest. I pass over the details of this part of my life, which would occupy too much space, and proceed to the -th of October, 183-. After a busy day, I was calmly seated by the parlor fireside, about nine o'clock at night, with the newspapers before me. My wife was by my side-several of the eldest of our nine sons and daughters joined to our conversation-while the younger ones were gamboling over the carpet. The room displayed everything that taste or Juxury could desire, and wore the comfortable and genial air which a blazing hearth bestows. A pattering rate which best against the windows, and the voice of the coming winter which sighed in the gale without, contrastor with all these and added to their charm; and the whole figured a scene of happiness and contentment into which r seemed that no thoughts or shapes of evil could introde. I was deeply engaged in calculating what States would go for. and what others against me, in the approaching election is: President, when, suddenly, my old acquaintance, the demon, stood before me

I was scarcely less amaged than horror-struck. In my various reverses of sorrow and of joy I had kept little note of the flight of time, and suspected not how swiftly it had moved. I supposed that I had at least a dozen good years left; instead of which, the whole thirty were now at an end! But the king of the infernal regions appeared not now in the softened guise with which I had seen him elothed at our former interview. He came now, not to beguile and win, but to claim his victim. His figure seemed more colossal a fiercer wrath kindled up his features, and a gloomier grandeur was seated on his brow. A diabolic grip of malicious expliation somewhat relayed his countenance, only to reoder it more terrible, as he fixed upon us the glare of his large and fiery eyes, He had on the same old blue cost that I had seen him wearing thirty years before. Its enormous pockets seemed stuffed fuller than ever with papers. He thrust his hand into one of them, and pulled out a large bundle, tied with red tape. "I think," said he, "the time of your bond is nearly run out; let's see; here it is-no, this is a liea I have on the chairman of the committee of manufactures in the House of Representatives, who drew up the tariff act of 1832; the three members from South Carolina who voted for said hill are also included This is another lied, on the President of the United States, who threatened his native State with the bayonet, in case she attempted to defend her liberty. This is the boad of the old woman who edits the Richmond Enquirer: she hopes to become an ambassador, but I think will miss it. This is the compact of a big South Carolina general: he expects to be made sheriff, down yonder, but I know better than to trust him. Ah, here's your bond, at last; it is due this night, at

The large clock before me pointed to within tea minutes of the time! Who can tell the agency which thrilled my heart as I prepared to take leave of Laura and happiness forever! But it was to her that the demon addressed himself. "Come, modum," said he, howing very low, "please to get ready. I must immediately have the pleasure of your company to the infernal regions."

twenty five minutes after nine o'clock."

but, thank Heaven, I alone. Upon that pure and angelic creature you can have no claim.  $^{\rm D}$

"You are mistaken," said he, "I have a chain, so head that Heaven heelt can not save her from me. Here to her bond, signed by her own hand, by which she is now foreited to my power. I see, sir, that this was done without your knowledge. You are to understand that a few days before your marrage. Lacra sent Kalouf to me, requesting an interview. She there proposed that I should take her, as a subatume for you. To that I convenied, and in embange for your bond she gave me her own, of which I now demand, and will have payment."

This was, indeed, too time. Latural generous love had prompted her to the hemic act of sacrificing heaveil. In order to store me. It was in vain that I now enteroned and implaned the demon to take me instead of her-it was to run that I vetermeally urged that I was his proper victim. He was inscendible, "Since the time of Ere." said he, "there has been upon this earth nothing in female shape that I have been so account to possess as your Lunn. When I hear away to the regions of paus and darkness her whom the Creatin formed to give now insent to the giver of his own courts, her will it full with shame and recation my remines in hearten?

"However," continued he, "I have a variety of business to attend to, which will occupy me upon earth for nearly a week. It will probably be from dura before I return to Pandemonium. I will leave you until then to get ready to accompany me. I will also make an offer which will affect you a chance of escape. Provided that you will deliver to me the souls of twenty-five other persons. I will take them as a submitude for yours, and agree to cancel your boad." Thus speaking, the deman disappeared.

I instantly set to work, and published the following advertisement:

"WASTER TO PURCHASE,

Immediately, twenty-five souls. Being very anxious to obtain then, and having abundance of money, the subscriber is willing to allow a high price, and to pay the cash down.

"HEYEY TREVOL!

Expecting of course great difficulty in finding persons willing to sell. I comprised most of the day on circulating this notice as much as possible. Upon returning to my horse, however, I found several hundred persons already assembled to treat with me. | preserved that they were all Yankers.

- "Well, my friend," said I, accessing one of them, "what will you take for your soul!"
- "What are you going to do with it ?" inquired be.
- "I want it to go to the infernal regions in my place," I replied.
- "In that case," said the Yankee, "it will not be a small sum which will personde me to sell it. Who can calculate the worth of an immortal spoil." It is more precious than much nomen and sweet spices—the blowed Sethour died to redeen it—it is descined to joy in beaven, or to pain in hell elemni—I will not take less than ten dollars in specie for my small."
- "Very well," said I. "I will give it to you, though I am by no means sure that I am not paying more than its value."

The above may seem as a specimen of my purchases. I seem bought the twenty-five, at prices varying from two to ten collars, as the fear or avaries of the eiller predominated. Toward the last, as the company perceived that my number was nearly made up, creat competition was excited, and of course processful exceedingly. I could then have bought as many as I pleased for next to outboar. Those who had not sold, went away intently bewarding their disappointment.

After paying to each man his money, I locked up my new purchases in a safe room, telling them that in three days I would deliver them to the devil. There they remained, very bonely engaged in swapping clothes and trading with each other, and I was informed that by night there was not a single once of them who had not made all least six dollars by his speculations.

The demon retorned punctual to the time. I now met blin without fear, and producing my twenty-five substitutes, demanded a receipt in full.

"Mr. Trevor," said he, looking secondal and offended. "I had a hetter opnism of you than to suppose that you would attempt to cheet me in this staneful manner. Do you dink to pay my debt to me in that which is my own property already? Thus is the same as if you owed your neighbor twenty-fare cutile, and were to go into his field and take beauswith his beand on them, and offer them to him as payment. These mea all have my mark opput them. And besides, to par the matter on another ground, this is no compliance with my offer, for these creatures have no soils. I will show you."

The deril, it is to be understood, in a wonderfully shillidy chemest, and knows how to analyze all substances, whether material or sportinal. In a few minutes he erested a forescer, seized one of the Yushees, and dissequeed from the body that which in these enimals supplies the place of a soul. It stood up before us, a thong unterly strange and indeembable. He put it into a large crucible, reduced it to a fluid mass, and then separated the compounting parts. It consisted of

"There," said the devil, holding it up, "do you call that thing a scal  $\mathcal{P}^{\mu}$

With a furious and exasperated look, he was now just about to seize Laura in his horrid clotches, when at that momenture exclusion is existed to the exame a subordinate demon, in great haste: "My large," exclusioned he, "the Unionists are holding a meeting in Charleston! You are wasted there immediately?" At this news the demon, delighted, flow away instantly, saying to me that he would return the next day.

CHAPTER XI.

Obtains thus mother short respite, I endeavored to bethink myself of some other method of escape. As that time these were in South Carolina three famous conjurers, who were said to here performed many nationaling feats all over the country. I went to them, related my case, and entereted them, if it were possible, to derive means for my relief. Assuring me that there was but one effection! plan, they retired into a large apartment, and begun their magical rives.

They set out a large pot, nearly filled with water from the Saramach River. They there into it the virings of leffessen, the Croix, by Turnbull, the speeches of M Duffie, Hayne, etc., a parcel of tones gathered from the battle-fields of the Bevolution, and a variety of other powerful ingentiests. They placed under it, as fuel, large quantities of a newspaper celled the Columbia Telescope, which presently took fire, by its own internal heat, and thazed upward with a raddy and intense fame.

Of these conjures, one was a tall and sheder man, with an eye of extraordinary brilliancy, and a Southern impelencesty of speech and manner. He had just arrived at that age when the intellect is strongest, and ambition is most actent. He was distinguished by the holitest talents and the porest integrity. In his presence, almost every one fall that undescribable power by which the superior spirit erways the minds of other men with an indefinable and commanding charm. He for the most part sat still, waring his wand, and reading from a paper, dated "Pendelson, July 9th, 1881," and called an "Expection."

The second was not large in stature, but well formed, with dark but, thick whickers, and a very multiway are. His spark-ling thack eye was lit up with humes, we, and moonmon fire. His whole mieu and bearing indicated that a tenement of they was never azimated by a spirit more ordest, endussiance, and determined. Every chivaleurs quality adorned his character, and had procured him the appropriate appellation of "the Bayard of the South." He looked as if these was nothing whatever of noble enterprise which he would fear to amount, or which having undertaken, he would ever abandon while earth or heaven afforded means for its accomplishment, He struted the not.

The dired was about six feet two incleas high, and thirtyserves years of age. His bair, prenaturely thinned and tinged with gray, gave fully to view his broad, holty, and receding forehead. His eye was large, full, and gray; his person exceedinely noble and majestic, and every movement and every gesture was the perfection of manly gracefulness. He was possessed of no eleopeness scarcely suspassed by that of his exrestor, the farmous scatter of Virgiota and which seemed sufficient to animate any heart energy that of a subcussioned, with the same passionate spirit of courses and here of liberty which burned in his sows. His speaking features glowed with the expression of such transcendent genium, generality, courses, and magnatimity as between and nature only bestow, at rare internals, upon some featurele child. He speak the incustation,

O might's Spirit, whom the Power Supreme, To guard and fundated the secred cause Of liberty and justice bath appointed— Theo who, upon a thousand buttle-fields, In the appressor's and the tyrant's blood Host bathed thy burning lace—O Goddows, pow, We pray that thou to as will redge give, Beneath thy broad, invulnerable shield.

In every ace and every elime thou still
Hast been adar'd by all whose generous soula
Love givey, and profer even death to blame;
Thy presence hallow'd each triomphant field
Where Liberty has been preserved or won,
Or the warm eurreat of the patriot's heart
Poured forth in its defense—Thermopylie,
And Marathon, and Enlaw, and King's Mountain,
Still wear the glory that thy footsteps shed;
And lasting as the deep-fixed earth itself
Shall be the memories that hower over them.

The coward and the stare may fear to book upon The redinace of thy avrial countenance; But so thy children pleasant is the eight, As in thy terrible hearty then dest come, And nations are effreglished at thy name.

Through thee we long chiliverance and years; But yet, if blood must flow, untertified, And trusting still to Providence and thee, We'll do not duty in our country's cause, Even through Death himself, on his pale horse, Should lead the charge against us.

La olden times
Our fasteen wordinged at thy holy abrine,
And prooffy wared, so many a well-freight field,
Thy bright, victoriece beamer. Aid no now,
And thy pure lemple soon rebuilt shall rise,
And in our lead thy worship shall endure
To all eternity—

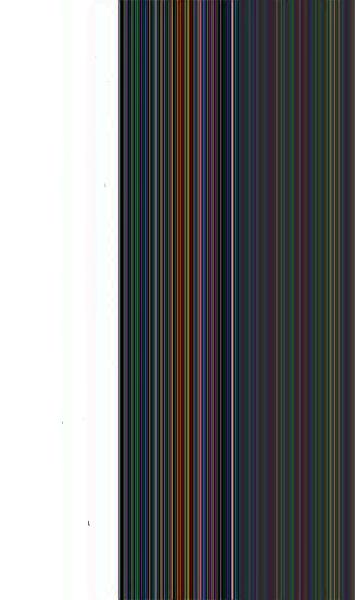

Golders, arise!

By all the wrongs of this oppressed land—
By all the blood for freedom ever shed—
And by our rights—and by our fathers! gaves—
And by the soil beneath—and heaven above—
We call upon thee—

In the hellow'd name
Of Jefferson, thy high priest—and in the name
Of the chief good, divnoest Liberty,
We call upon thee—appear, appear, appear!

and as the words of power were spoken, the thirk vapor which arese from the boiling caldron, and filled the whole apartment, gradually gathered itself logarither and become condensed into the slarpe of a hexatiful and photons female spirit. Her figure was of supernatural size, and displayed the perfortion of symmetry and gazes. A flood of rosy light was poured around her person, which showe with the inefiable loreliness of elected youth. A shiring believe was on her how, beauth which long warning hur, as bright as sunbeaus, flower over her unovered shoulders. In one hand she held a faming sword, and in the other an office branch, while on her left arm hungs broad and glittering skield. Her eyes spatified with enlested fire, and their glance abone seemed sufficient to strike terror into whole comes. A robe, like that of a Greeina goddess, flowed lightly around her. It was of prore white, with here and there a few streaks of a crimson hoe. Her whole form was invested with such beauty and such majority as immortality above may wear; and would have been too dearling to look upon, but that a pheind shade softened the decreases of the reflance, and made it infertable to human wears.

The magnificent spirit smiled benigaly, and bidding us dismus our fear, took Lavra by the hand, while I placed myself at her side. The time for the return of the demon had now served. Accordingly, presently he earne frying in, his contenance inflamed with worth and impatience. The first object that met his eyes was our negable protectives. "What's that?" impured he in the utmost astanishment. "That," said I. "is NULLIFICATION!" At that worful name, the demon, with a shirek of hourse and construction, instantly took to fight; and I have neither seen nor heard from him since. Should be ever hereafter attempt to molest me, he shall be again NULLIFICA.

NULLIFICATION IN 1832-133.

Tax word "Nullifiertion," ecording to Mr. Parton, was involved into American politics in 1798, when the Legikhtures of Virginia and Kentricky, prompted by the Alien and Selvino laws, adopted the famous resolutions of '98, of which Mr. Lefferson and Mr. Medison were the chief authors. Out of the severeignty of the original Colonies, on entering the Federal Union, had grown the doctrine of State rigidity; and the object of these resolutions was to protest against a possible awargation of power by the general government. One of them deduced that, for the assumption of powers not delegated by the States, "a multification of the act was the rightful remety." But, according to the same resolution, the act of the general government must amount to an undisquired declaration that it will proceed to enteries over the States all powers whateverer. The resolutions of '98 were the work of men who leved the Union of the States, and "were drawn and possed in the interest of the Union, to account the Union, to account the Union, to account display the state of the Union, to account the Union, to account display from the union to provide a way of restoring the Union, of it was ever threatened with dissolution."

The sublifies of 1822, however, put a different construction upon this namer. They manutained that any single State may multify an set of Congress which it deams unconstitutional, although Mr. Calhoun declared that such auditication does not tend to dissolve the Union. The extremists means, in fact, that any State may seeds from the Union whenever it blass. "If this thing goes on," creditioned General Jackson, "our country will be like a hang of meal, with both ends spen. Prick in up in the middle or endruse, it will run out."

The first act of South Carolina tending to unlihibration was the throwing away her vote in the exciting Presidential election of 1812. This was the more significant from the fact that the very system of which she complained so much was the principal issue of the campaign. In 1828 the South elected General Jackson, as being less friendly than his rival candidate to the great protective or American system, which Mr. Clay had mainly harlt up by his life-long efforts. General Jackson was re-elected by an overwhelming majority. He was opposed to a high protective tariff. The interests of South Carolina appeared to be identified with him, yet she was not satisfied. Her discontent, as John Davis, of Messachusetts. said in Congress, "lay deeper than the tanff, and will continue when that is forgotten." It existed, in fact, in the antipathy between the North and the South, resulting from the different character of the people and the different systems of labor, producing in each section their legitimate result. "The contest," says Mr. Parton, "between the slow and limited prosperity of the South, and the swift, noisy, marvelous progress of the North, was never so striking as it was during the administration of General Jackson. The North was rushing on like a Western high-pressure steambast, with rosin in the fornace and a man on the safety-valve. All through Western New York, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois the primeval wilderness was vanishing like a mist, and towns were springing into existence with a rapidity that rendered necessary a new map every month, and spoiled the gazetteers as fast as they were printed. The city of New York, as Mr. Irving has beautifully told us, began already to feel itself the London of the New World, and to calculate how many years must elapse before in would be the London of the proverse.18

<sup>4</sup>The South, meanwhile, was depressed and agrious, Cotton was down. Tobacco was down, Corn, wheat, and pork were down. For several years the chief products of the South lad either been inclining downward, or else had risen in price too slowly to make up for the (alleged) increased price of the commodities which the South was compelled to buy. Few new towns changed the Southern map. Charleston languished, or seemed to languish; certainly did not keep up with New York, Boston, and Philadelphia. No Cineronati of the South became the world's talk by the startling rapidity of its growth. No Southern river exhibited, at every head and coyne of vantage, a rising village. No Southern mind, distracted by the impossibility of devising suitable names for a thousand new places per annom, fell back in despair upon the map of the Old World. and selected at random any convenient name that presented itself, bestowing upon clusters of log huts such titles as Utica. Rome, Palermo, Naples, Russia, Egypt, Madrid, Paris, Elba, and Berlin. No Southern commissioner, compelled to find names for a hundred streets at once, had seized upon the letters of the alphabet and figures of arithmetic, and called his avenues A. B. C. and D. and instead of naming his cross streets, numbered them."

The North stributed this remortable contrast to the defect in Southern below. "Not so," said the Southern politicuses; "we long dear and sell cheep—the protective turn! is the cause of our columnities and our deery." The sharety question was not yet agained, but oven in these exciting times we can scarcely comprehend the political assimatory and violence that characterized the administration of General Jackson. The speeches the excitations, and hortespass of that day exhibit the mouncal antiparty between the North and the South in the strongest light.

A detect one bonderd and theiry millions of dallars and a great number of small manufactories were among the results of the war of 1812. To provide for this debt a larger revenue was required, and the manufacturing interest asked for some part of that complete protection which the war had given it. The protectionists recompled in 1816, and it is not a little singular that the most active and evaluous among them was John C. Callovan, then a member of the House of Representatives.

"The country in Europe," said he, referring as Poland, "baring the most skillful workmen, is broken up. It is to us, if wisely used, more relutable than the repeal of the edies of Naness was to England." Even Mr. Clay admitted that Mr.
Callovan had surpassed him in earnestness for the cause of portection. The principle was earned still further in the tariff bills of 1820, 1824, and 1826. In 1824, however, the South began to contend that the tariff was mainly admantageous to Northern interests. The maximum of discontinal grew, in 1823, into general and violent opposition. Mullification loomed up indistinctly in the Sundern stry.

In 1831 the public debt had been no reduced that but there years more would be required to pay it off eatirely. In view of this, the people of the South demanded that prosection, instead of being reduced as a principle, should be made simply incidential, and so graduated that the amount of duties derived from it should about equal the expenditures of the government. Such a measure would have reduced the revenue between twelve and thirteen million dollars, whereas, in the session of 1831-192 after an exciting debate of several months' duration, they succeeded in passing a bell diaminshing the revenue only about $2,000,000.

Meanwhile in the spring of 1831, had been published the bustile correspondence between the President and Mr. Calhoun, growing out of the fact that the latter had proposed, in a gabinet council, the arrest or punishment of General Jackson for all-god misconduct in regard to the Seminole war. A few months later, also, Mr. Calboon had continued the strife between the two creat leaders, by publishing in the Pendleton Messenger, of South Carolina, his first essay on Nollineation. He took the ground that Nollification is the natural, proper, and peaceful remedy for an intolerable grievance inflicted by Congress upon a State or upon a section; and, seeming to forget his advocacy of protection in 1816, maintained that the tariff of 1808 would be such a grievance, unless rectified during the next session of Congress. Mr. Calbour was the leading spirit of the South Carolinians. What could have more inflamed their discontest than this unsatisfactory tanifibill of June, 1831?

A month after the adjournment of Congress, the Vice-President returned to South Carolina, and the Legislature of that State, early in the autumn, passed an act calling a convention of her outzens to consider the late act of Congress, and suggest the course to be pursued in relation to it. The Convention, consisting of one hundred members, and including representatives of nearly all the great families of the State, assembled at Columbia on the 19th of November. The result of this meeting was the celebrated Oudinaxon, signed by every member, and decreeing that the tariff law of 1828, and the amendment to the same of 1832, were "noll and void," that no duties enjoined by it should be paid in South Carolina after the 1st of February, 1833; that in no case involving the validity of the expected pollifying act of the State Legislature, should an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States be permitted; that every office-holder and every juror to the State should be required to obey the Ordinance and the consequent acts of the Legislature; and, finally, that in case the general government should in any way undertake to enforce the tariff law, the citizens of South Carolina would hold themselves absolved from all further allegance to it, and would forthwith proceed to organize a separate government.

Robert V. Hayne, a member of the Convention, and also of the Senate of the United States, was elected governor of the State, and its entreps entered into the theory of multification with remarkable unanimity and enthusiasm. The new Gorernor entirely indused in his message, early in December, the acts of the Covention. "I recognize," said be, "no allegiance as paramount to that which the citizens of South Carolina owe to the State of their birth or their adoption. I here publicly declare, and wish it to be distinctly understood, that I shall hold myself bound by the highest of all obligations to carry into full effect not only the ordinance of the Convention, but every act of the Legislature, and every judgment of our own courts, the enforcement of which may devolve on the exerative. * * * If the sacred soil of Carolina should be polluted by the footsteps of an invader, or be stained by the blood of her citizens shed in her defense. I trust in Almighty God that no son of hers, native or adopted, who has been mourided at her bosom, or been chemised by her bosom, will be found raising a perceidal arm against our common mother. * * * South Carolina can not be drawn down from the proof entirence on which the has placed benefit energy by the banks of her own children."

The Legislature immediately passed the and requisite for carrying the Oxinance into precisal effect. "The State," says Mr. Partna, "resumbed with the miss of warrike prepartion. Bine excludes with a polimetro button in the center, uppeared upon thousands of losts, bounds, and bosoms. Meddas were struck, ere long, bearing this inscription: 'John C. Calhoun. First President of the Southern Condetency!" No less a person than the Vice-President himself was chosen to fill the vacatory in the United States Senate, created by the election of Mr. Bayar to the governorship. Mr. Calhons carepiod the sent, and set out for Washington early in December.

The President of the United States was General Andrew Jackson, who in his insurgural north had sworn, "to take care that the laws of the Union were faithfully executed." He are the raing storm, and made his preparations accordingly. On the arroral of the news at Washington that the nulliflers were about to hold a State Convention, he was secret orders to the collection of the part of Charleston to resert to all legal means to endorse the revenue laws, in case of their violation by the citizens of Storth Carolina, and for that purpose, if meessary, employ the revenue outness within his district, General Stort was also quirely ordered to Charleston for the Purpose "of superintending the safety of the ports of the United States in that vicinity."

The President was terriby in earnest. "Dule," said he to "Rig Sam." who happened to be to Washington when sulfifcation was the all-engrossing subject, "they are trying me here; you will witness it; but by the God of heaven, I will uphold the laws!" And when his firend expressed the hope that thangs would go right, "They state go right!" he exclaimed passenately, stirreting the pipe upon the table.

The annual message of 1832 gives, however, searcely an infimation of the prevailing excitement. The President announced that during the four years of his administration the public debt had been diminished $80,000,000: that the income of the year would reach $80,000,000, and the expenditures but $16,500,000. He advised a revision of the taxif, so as to reduce the revenue to the necessities of the government, and denoted but a single paragraph to the touchles in South Condition. He relied upon the peaceful administration of the laws, but promised an immediate notice to Congress should an engency arms readening their execution impracticable. Nothing could have been more temperate and conciliatory. This, however, was the salient paragraph of the message

Meanwhile General Jackson was preparing another remarkable document. The proceedings of the South Carolina Convention were communicated to him on one of the last days of November. On no other occasion did that noble man rise more completely above all personal considerations and exhibit his great qualities of soul, "He went to his office alone." says Mr. Parton, "and began to dash off page after page of the memorable Proclamation which was soon to electrify the country. He wrote with that great steel pen of his, and with such rapidity that he was obliged to scatter the written pages all over the table to let them dry. A centleman who came in after the President had written fifteen or twenty pages, observed that three of them were glistening with wet ink at the same moment. The warmth, the glow, the passion, the eloquence of that proclamation were produced then and there by the President's own hand."

These pages, with other memorands, were then placed in the hands of Mr. Livingston, the Secretary of State, who was requested to draw up the produmation in a proper form. In the course of three or four days it was brought to the General and left for his examination. After reading it, the President remarked that Mr. Livingston had not correctly understood his notes, and that portions of the draft mast be altered. The second draft being satisfactory, he ordered it to be published. It having been suggested to the General to leave out that portion to which the State-rights party would certainly object, he refused, saying: "These are my views, and I will not change them, nor strike them out." As Mr. Parton justly remarks, the word proclamation does not does the this remarkable paper. "It reads more like the last appeal of a sorrowing but resolute father to wayword, imagined sons. Argument, warning, and extraty were blended in its composition. It began by calmly refuting, one by one, the leading positions of the militiens. The right to caveal and the right to secole, as claumed by them, were shown to be incompatible with the fundamental idea and main obpect of the Constitution, which was "to form a more perfect Union."

Of the Federal Constitution, the President says; "We have hitherto relied on it as the perpetual bond of our union. We have received it as the work of the assembled wisdom of the nation. We have trusted to it as to the sheet-anchor of our safety in the stormy times of condlet with a foreign or domeatic foe. We have looked to it with sacred awe, as the palladium of our liberties, and, with all the solemnities of religion. have pledged to each other our lives and fortunes here, and our hopes of happiness hereafter, in its defense and support, Were we mistaken, my countrymes, in attaching this importance to the Constitution of our country? Was our devotion paid to the wretched, inefficient, classry contrivance which this new doctrine would make it? Did we pledge conselves to the support of an airy nothing-a bubble that must be blown away by the first breath of disaffection? Was this self-destroying, visionary theory the work of the profound statesmen, the exalted patriots, to whom the task of constitotional reform was intrusted? Did the name of Washington sanction, did the States deliberately ratify, such an anomaly in the history of fundamental legislation? No. We were not mistaken! The letter of this great instrument is free from this radical fault; its lauguage directly contradicts the impotation; its spirit—its evident intent, contradicts it."

Having deated the right of secession, he inquires, "How can that State be said to be serverign and independent whose citizens over obedience to have not made by it, and whose manistrates are event to disregard these laws when they come in condict with those possed by another ?" * * * * "Fellow-evidence of my nature State !—let me not only almedial, you, as the first magistrate of our common country, not to intere the penalty of its laws, but one the inducence that a future would oracle his children whom he saw rashing to a certain rom. In that parenal largrangs, with that paternal feeling, let me full you, my countrymen, that you are deliated by men who are either deceived themselves or who to deserve you.

Contemplate the condition of that country of which you still form an important part; consider its government uniting in one bond of common interest and general protection so many different States-giving to all their inhabitants the proud title of American citizen-protecting their commerce-securing their literature and arts-facilitating their intercommunication -defending their frontiers-and making their name respected in the remotest parts of the earth! Consider the extent of its territory, its increasing and happy population, its advance in arts, which render life agreeable, and the sciences which elevate the mind! See education spreading the lights of religion, morality, and general information into every cottage to this wide extent of our Territories and States! Behold it as the asylum where the wretched and the oppressed find a refuse and support! Look on this picture of happiness and honor, and say we, too, are citizens of America-Carolina is one of these proud States her arms have defended-her best blood has cemented this happy Union! And then add, if you can, without horror and remorse. This happy Union we will dissolve -this picture of peace and prosperity we will deface-this free intercourse we will interrupt—these fertile fields we will delage with bloof-the protection of that glorious flag we renounce—the very name of Americans we diseard. And for what, mistaken men! for what do you throw away these inestimable blessings-for what would you exchange your share in the advantages and honor of the Union? For the dream of a separate independence-a dream interrupted by blordy conflicts with your neighbors, and a vile dependence on a foreign power,"

The proclamation was received at the North with almost unanimous embusiaem. Union meetings were held in most of the Stoice. The South Carolinians received it with equal 10 unanimity, but in a totally opposite spirit. The Legislature of that State being still in session, requested the Governor to issue a counter proclamation, which proved to be a most pugnacious document. He pronounced the doctrines of the President's proclamation pernictous, felse, tending to uproof the very foundation of our political system, and contemplating a great consolidated empire, one and indivisible, the worst of all despotisms. Declaring that South Carolina would maintain her sovereignty or be hursed beneath its ruins, he solemnly warned his fellow-citizens against all attempts to sednee them from their allegiance to the State. He charged them to be faithful to their duty as citizens, and earnestly exhorted them to disregard those "vain menaces" put forth by the President. In a second message to Congress, promised in that which opened the session, should circumstances require it, President Jackson asked for an increase of powers to meet the exigency. This communication was dated January 16th, 1833. He began by stating that he had received officially from the Governor of South Carolina a copy of the nullifying codinance of the Couvention at Columbia. He gave a brief review of the threatening proceedings in South Carolina, and of the measures adonted by the administration. Wishing it to be understood that the government were disposed to remove all just cause of complaint, he declared that the supremary of the laws would, nevertheless, he maintained. The President knew that there was great discontent in the South, from a "conviction than the general government was working disadvantageously to that part of the Union in the vital points of the levy and the expenditore of the federal revenue; and that it was upon this feeling that politicians operated to produce disaffection to the Union." In one paragraph the tables were turned upon the Governor of South Carolina in a way that must have been appreciated at the time. It was in reference to the "oppression" of the tariff, so much complained of by the South Caroliniana. "That the reveoue system hitherto pursued," said the President, "has resulted in no each appression upon South Caroling, needs no other proof than the solemn and official deelsration of the late chief magistrate of that State, in his address to the Legislature. In that he says, that the occurrences of the past year, in connection with our domestic concerns, are to be reviewed with a sentiment of ferrent gratitude to the Great Disposer of human ereats; that inhouse of gradful acknowledgment are due for the tracious and multiplied blessings flet has been pleased to bessure on our people; that abundant harvests, in every quarter of the State, have convend the exertions of agricultural labor; that health, almost beyond former precedent, has blessed our homes; and float there is not lear reason for theatfulness in exerciping our accid condition.<sup>178</sup> precedent, has bissed our homes; and fast there is not has resson for theat/fulness in surreging our accid condition.<sup>12</sup>

A full condering additional powers upon the President, to enable him to execute the laws in South Carolina, was promptly reported, but did not pass and late in February. It was assailed by several members as volent, unconstitutional, and tending to circl way. Mr. Webers rebuted all the retoperation heaped upon this measure (known as the Force hill), and gave it the support of his great talents. Though politieally opposed to the President, and accused by his neurous of subservincing for the sake of fixture favors, he defended with transcendent additing the cause of the constitution and the country.

Mr. Calbonn had received Washinston ton works before

Mr. Calhoun had reached Washington two works before the communication of the President's second message to Congress. What would the great Nullifier to? Would be swear to support the Constitution of the United States? "Says one of his biographers: "The floors of the Segate Chamber and the gallenes were thronged with spectators. They saw him take the eath with a solemnity and dimity appropriate to the occasion, and then calmly sent himself on the right of the chair, among his old political friends, nearly all of whom were now arrayed against him." Mr. Calboun heard the President's message read in the Senate Chamber, and after its conclusion, rose to vinducate himself and his State. Declaring himself still devoted to the Union, he said that if the government were restored to the principles of 1798, he would be the last man in the country to question its authority. It was not until the 15th of February that he introduced the famous resolutions termed by him, " Resolutions on the Powers of the Government." and clearly involving the doctrine of millifiestion. These he defended with all of his remarkable force and solviery. Mr. Webster replied on the following day, in a speech second only to power and brillinary to his reply to Hayne, three years provious. The great constitutional expossible conducted into four brief and pointed propositions his opinious upon the nature of the compact variing the different State of the Union:

- 1. That the Constitution of the United States is not a league, confideracy, or compact between the people of the several States in their severage expensives; but a government proper, founded on the obspican of the people, and creating direct relations between itself and individuals.
- 2. That no State authority has power to dissolve these relations; that nothing can dissolve them but revolution; and that, consequently, there can be no such thing as secsions without revolution.
- *3. That there is a suprane law, consisting of the Constitution of the United States, and ares of Congress passed in pursuance of it, and treaties; and that, in cases not capable of assuming the ekarceter of a soin in law or expirty, Congress must judge of, and facilly interpret, this suprane law so often as it has occasion to pass acts of legislation, and in eases expable of assuming, and actually assuming the character of a pain, the Supreme Court of the United States is the final interpreter.
- "4. That are attempt by a State to abrogate, amoul, or nutilify an ext of Congress, or to arrest its operation within her limits, on the proped that, in her opinion, such have is unconstitutional, is a direct toarpation on the just powers of the general government, and on the equal rights of other States; a plain violation of the Constitution, and a proceeding oscertically revolutionary in its character and tendency."

In conclusion, he said: "Be assured, at, he assured, that among the political evolutions of this people, the love of union is still uppermost. They will stand fast by the Constitution, and by those who defend it. I rely on so temporary expedients, on no political combination; that I rely on the true American feeling, the genuine patriotism of the people, and the imperative decision of the public voice. Disorder and confusion, indeed, may arise; series of emmonion and contest are threatened, and perhaps may come. With my whole heart. I pray for the continuance of the domestic peace and quiet of the country. I desire, most ardently, the restoration of affection and harmony to all its parts. I desire that every citizen of the whole country may look to this government with no other seatiments than those of grateful respect and attachment. But I can not yield even to kind feelings the cause of the Constitution, the true glory of the country, and the great trust which we hold in our hands for succeeding ages. If the Constitution can not be maintained without meeting these scenes of commotion and contest, however unwelcome, they must come. We can not, we must not, we dare not omit to do that which, in our judgment, the safety of the Union requires. Not regardless of consequences, we must yet meet consequences; seeing the hazards which surround the discharge of public daty, it must yet be discharged. For myself, sir, I shup no responsibility justly devolving on me, here or elsewhere, in attempting to maintain the cause. I am brond to it by indissoluble ties of affection and duty, and I shall cheerfully partake in its fortunes and its fate. I am ready to perform my own appropriate part, whenever and wherever the occasion may call on me, and to take my chance among these upon whom blows may fall first and fall thickest. I shall exert every faculty I possess in aiding to prevent the Constitution from being mallified, destroyed, or impaired; and even should I see it fall, I will still, with a voice feeble, perhaps, but earnest as ever issued from human lips, and with fidelity and neal which nothing shall extinguish, call on the Propers to come to its research

What in the mean time had been the course of events in South Caroline? The military posts in that Sate had been filled with United Sates troops, and a naval force acclosed off Charleston. The laws had been serietly enforced, though care was taken to avoid, if possible, a counter with the State authorities. The Carolinians also had conditude their military preparations. Palmento thays and excludes were employed to hindle the enthusistson of the people. "The first of February, the dreaded day which was to be the first of a feativideal war, had gone by," says Mr. Parton, "and yet no hossile and no nullifying act had been done in South Carolina. How was this? Did these warlike words mean nothing? Was South Carolina repentant? It is asserted by the old Jacksonians that one citizen of South Carolina was exceedingly frightened as the first of February drew near, namely, John C. Calhoon. The President was resolved, and arowed his resolve that the hour which brought the news of one act of violence on the part of the nullifiers, should find Mr. Calhono a prisoner of State upon a charge of high treason.* And not Calhoun only, but every member of Congress from South Carolina who had taken part in the proceedings which had caused the conflict between South Carolina and the General Government. Whether the intention of the President had any effect upon the cause of events, we can not know. It came to pass, however, that a few days before the first of February, a meeting of the leading pullifiers was held in Charleston, who passed resolutwas to this effect; that, masmuch as measures were then peoding in Congress which contemplated the reduction of duties demanded by South Carolina, the pullification of the existing revenue laws should be postponed until after the adjournment of Congress; when the Convention would re-assemble and take into consideration whatever revenue measures may have been passed by Congress,"

The measures here alluded to as pending in Congress, were a bill reported in the House by Mr. Galian C. Verplank, on the 28th of December. In conformity with the President's recommendation in his message, it was calculated to reduce the annual revenue thirteen millions of dollars. Its effect would be to carry back the protective system to nearly the standard of 1816. Though not sufficient for the capitalists who, under the stimulus of legislative protection, had invested their means in the manufacturing interest, it was deemed sufficient for those who possessed the skill and care to conduct their enterprises with economy. To the government it would

* In his last eickness, General Jackson declared, that, in reflecting upon his administration, he chiefly regretted that he had not had John C. Calbour. executed for treason. "My country," said he, "would have sustained me in the act, and bis fate would have been a warning to tentions in all time to give all the revenue needed. To the great opponents of the tariff it was bound to be satisfactory. It was just what the South clamores for. Why, then, did not the Verplank bill pass? Why did it linger in the House under toterminable debates on systems and theories? Are the advocates of political measures in Congress always brosst in their professions? "The 25th of February had arrived," says Mr. Benton, "and found the bill still affeat upon the wordy sea of stormy debate, when, all of a sudden, it was arrested, knocked over, run under, and merged and lost in a new one, which expranged the old one and took its place. It was late in the afternoon when Mr. Letcher, of Kentucky, the fast friend of Mr. Clay, rose in his place and moved to strike out the whole Verplank bill-except the enacting clause-and insert in lieu of it a bill offered in the Senate by Mr. Clay, since called the 'Compromise," and which lingered at the door of the Senate upon a question of leave for its admittance. This was offered in the House without notice, without signal, without premonitory symptoms, and just as the members were prepared to adjourn. Some were taken by surprise, and looked about in amazement; but the majority showed consciousness, and, what was more, readiness for action. The bill, which made its first appearance in the House when members were gathering up their overcoats. for a walk home to their dinners, was passed before those coats had got on the back; and the dinner, which was waiting had but little time to cool before the astonished members, their work done, were at the table to eat it. A bill without precedent in the annals of our legislation, and pretending to the sanetity of a compromise, and to settle great questions forever, went through to its consummation in the fragment of an evening session, without the compliance with any form which experionee and parliamentary law have devised for the safety of

The secret history of this "Compounde," in the remarkable narrative by Colouel Benton, furnishes one of the most interesting chapters of political reading. It was effected by a continuo between Mr. Clay and Mr. Calborn, who were antagonistic leaders in opposite political systems, had long been virals for the Presidency, and were not at the time on speaking terms with each other. Could such a coalition be other than a hollow trose? A rupture, a few years afterward, in the open Senate, gave the key to the secret motives which led to the Compromise. Mr. Callsons declared that he had Mr. Clay down—bad him on his back—was his masser. Mr. Clay retored: "He my muster! I would not own him for the meanest of my skires." Mr. Callsons claimed a controlling inducate for the military artitude of South Carolina and its unimulating effect upon the federal government. Mr. Clay niteraled this idea of intimidation, and said the little boys that muster in the streets with their tiny wooden awords had as well pretand to terrify the grand army of Bonaparte!

Mr. Leteler, a representative from Kentucky, was, eccording to Mr. Benton, the first to conceive an idea of some compromise to release South Carolina from her position. He communicated it to Mr. Clay, who received the proposition at first coolly, but finally down up the bill, and sent it to Mr. Calbann. An extivated interview between them ended without a farmable result.

Mr. Clay twoylet his hill forward in the Senate on the 16th of February. It proposed a gudtad, instead of a subten, reduction of duties, the chief object of the Verplank hill being to conclude the nullifiers. Mr. Clay's measure was, however, paralyzed by the opposition of the manufacturers. While it was linguing in the Senate without any apparent chance of passing, Mr. Clayton, of Delaware, need Mr. Clay to make a new more with his hill in a less appear Mr. Clay to make a new more with his hill in a less appear from the subtent Senation proposed amendments, provided the Southern Senation, including the senation of the senation of

Mr. Cusyna, however, did not give up, but notified Mr. Cusy and Mr. Cullions that if the amendments were not adopted in the Senate, he would himself more to lay the bill on the table, his object being to hind both of the leaders. Mr. Cusy offered the amendments, which were now adopted, one by one, woll it came to the measure of home valuation, which Mr. Cultoon and his friends declared to be unconstitutional, and an inseparable obstacle to their rotes. It was then late on the lost day but one of the session. Mr. Clayton executed his threat, and moved to lary the bill upon the table. In this extremity the Culbourn wing retired to the colonaade behind the Vice-Presiden's chart, and held a brief consultation. An adjournment was curried, and the next day they gave their adhesion to the amended brill. Even Mr. Calbourn was not spared the humilisation of voting for a measure which are months before, both himself and Mr. Clay would have deemed sufficient to hireak up the Colon.

Mr. Cilious journered honeward immediately ofter the adjournment of Congress. "Traveling night and day by the most rapid public conveyances, he succeeded in resetting Calumbia in time to meet the Convestom before they had taken any additional steps. Some of the more fiery and arisent memhers were disposed to complain of the Compromise ext. as being only a half-way temprorising measure; has when his explanations were made, all felt satisfied, and the Convention orehally approred of his course. The Nathification Ordinance was repealed, and the two parties in the State abundanced their organizations, and agreed to Greget all their past differences."

The ext of portfaction was tigorously desounced by several members of the Sentie, including Mr. Webter. "To call it a congruence," users Mr. Benton, "was to make sport of longrace, to borloope moforture, to turn force into stipolation, and to confound found and vollence with concession and contract. It was like exiling the rage of the Bonness upon the Sabine women, a marriage,"

The masses were alonged at the cry of circl war. Mr. Calbran's fineads saw for him a release from his perilous promon. Tand members found relief in a mobile come and General Jackson felt a positive relief in being spared the necessity of enforcing the laws by the sword and external procedulous.

"Certainly," says Mr. Benton, "it was absolutely incomprehensible that this doctrine of Nollification and Secession, 18 prefigured in the Roman secession to the sacred Mount and the Jewish disruption of the twelve tribes, should be thus enforced and impressed for that cause of the tariff alone." Mr. Calhoun afterward hinted at two other reasons: first, that every Southern man, true to the interests of his section, would be forever excluded from the honors and emoloniests of the government; and, secondly, to the contest between the North and the South-'a contest between power and liberty-in which the weaker section, with its peculiar labor, productions, and situation, has at stake all that is dear to freemen." "It was evident," also adds Mr. Benton, "that the protective tariff was not the sole or the main cause of South Carolina's discontent; that pullification and secession were to continue though their estensible cause ecased; that resistance was to ecutinue on a new ground, upon the same principle, putil a new and impassible point was attained."
